Lester Burns and Michael Coleman, ran but were quickly recaptured. The van was being operated by Prisoner Transportation Services, a private firm based in Nashville, Tennessee. The company declined to comment on the incident.

Pennsylvania: A dispute with a guard over toilet paper led to aggravated assault charges against Dauphin County prisoner Sakeem Lamar Gray, 21. On September 30, 2013, Gray had toilet paper hanging in his cell in violation of prison rules. When Gray ignored a guard's order to take down the paper, the guard entered the cell and removed it himself. Gray then attacked the guard and bit him on the arm. According to court records, Gray, who is required to take medication, was serving time for a previous aggravated assault charge.

Pennsylvania: Convicted rapist Omar Best, 36, was charged in October 2013 for attacking a 24-year-old civilian prison clerk and raping and choking her unconscious in her office at SCI-Rockview. The clerk, Belinda Croft, blew an emergency whistle but guards did not respond; officials gave no explanation for a 27-minute delay before Croft was found by other staff members, but a guards' organization blamed understaffing for the incident. The all-female clerical staff was subsequently moved from the prisoner housing unit to an administrative section of the facility. In April 2014, Croft filed a federal lawsuit against the Department of Corrections; Best was convicted of rape and assault on May 20, 2014 and is scheduled to be sentenced in August.

Tennessee: On October 24, 2013, Courthouse News Service reported that Shirley Vineyard, 61, had filed suit against Knox County Sheriff Jimmy Jones and guards at the Knox County Detention Center for failing to help as she was beaten with her own cane by another jail visitor. The incident, which was captured on video surveillance cameras, occurred as Vineyard visited her son at the jail on January 2, 2013. Anna Sharday Nicole Caswell, who was not named in the lawsuit, attacked Vineyard after claiming that she was in her "spot" at the visiting booths. Jail officials did not intervene to stop the assault and subsequently refused Vineyard's request for an ambulance.

Texas: In September 2013, McLennan County sheriff's deputies arrested Regina Antoinette Edwards and Dorothy Pennington, both guards at the privately-operated Jack Harwell Detention Center, for engaging in sexual misconduct with prisoners. The incidents, which were discovered on recorded cell phone calls, allegedly occurred between 2011 and 2013. Pennington pleaded guilty to a charge of improper sexual activity and was sentenced to five years' probation in January 2014. A third guard, Sherry Lynn Haynes, has been charged with smuggling cigarettes into the facility.

Texas: Retired state district judge Terrill L. Flenniken was sued by the Texas Center for Defense of Life, an anti-abortion group, for ordering a 15-year-old girl to continue residing with her grandmother and the grandmother's boyfriend, convicted sex offender Edward Clinton Lee. The suit, filed on October 8, 2013, claims that the couple was trying to force the girl to have an abortion after she became pregnant by her teenage boyfriend, and that the placement with her grandmother was improper because Lee was making sexual advances toward the girl. Three school officials, also named in the lawsuit, were criminally charged after they failed to report the girl was being sexually abused. Six months after Judge Flenniken's placement ruling, Lee sexually assaulted the girl and shot and killed her grandmother. Flenniken retired from the bench in December 2012; Lee pleaded guilty to rape and murder charges and is serving life without parole.

Texas: On September 27, 2013, Jose Rodriguez, 37, ran from the Nueces County Courthouse while being moved to the jail. He first tried to carjack a utility truck but the driver fought back. Next, while TV news crews videotaped, Rodriguez jumped behind the wheel of a police cruiser, found the keys were not in the ignition, then jumped out and headed for another police car. He locked the doors to keep officers out, but they broke the windows. Rodriguez now faces a long list of charges. ■

Systemic Changes Follow Murder of Colorado Prison Director

by John Dannenberg

JUST OVER A YEAR AFTER COLORADO Department of Corrections Director Tom Clements was killed by former prisoner Evan Ebel, who had been released directly from long-term solitary confinement, there have been significant and far-reaching changes in Colorado's prison system.

Following a police chase, Ebel, 28, was killed in a shootout with Texas law enforcement officers on March 21, 2013. Autopsy results later obtained by The Denver Post confirmed that he died from a gunshot wound to the forehead. Prior to the chase, Ebel had been stopped in his 1991 black Cadillac DeVille for a traffic offense and shot Texas deputy James Boyd multiple times, hitting him in the shoulder and chest and grazing his head.

Ebel spent nearly all of his eight years in prison in solitary confinement, known in Colorado as administrative segregation (ad-seg). His father, well-known attorney Jack Ebel, who was close to Colorado Governor John Hickenlooper, had previously said his son suffered from behavioral problems as a child, and that solitary damaged him even more.

"What I have seen over six years is, [Evan] has a high level of paranoia and [is] extremely anxious," Jack Ebel said at a state Senate Judiciary Committee hearing in 2011, when he testified about the effects of solitary confinement. "He may have had mental conditions going on. But they are exacerbated to the point that I hardly recognize my son sometimes. We are creating mental illness. We are exacerbating mental illness."

Murders and Aftermath

COLORADO AUTHORITIES SAID EBEL FIRST lured Domino's pizza deliveryman Nathan Leon to a truck stop in Denver on March 17, 2013, supposedly to deliver a pizza, then shot him to death. Before killing Leon, Ebel forced him to read a statement into a tape recorder criticizing the prison system's use of solitary confinement.

"[Y]ou didn't give two [expletive] about us or our families and you ensured that we were locked behind a door, to disrespect us at every opportunity, so why should we care about you and yours," a transcript of the recording stated. "In short, you treated us inhumanely, and so we simply seek to do the same, we take [comfort] in the knowledge that we leave your wives without husbands, and your children fatherless. You wanted to play the mad scientist, well they [prisoners held in solitary] will be your Frankenstein."

Ebel took Leon's pizza delivery uniform and, two days later, on March 19, wore it to the Clements' secluded home in Monument, Colorado, about an hour south of Denver. Lisa Clements, director of the Colorado Human Services' Behavioral Health Office, said she and her husband were watching TV when the doorbell rang. Tom Clements answered the door and Ebel shot him at point-blank range. Lisa said he died in her arms.

Ebel then hid out in Colorado Springs for two days before heading to Texas, where he was killed by officers following his shooting of Deputy Boyd, who survived.

In an August 26, 2013 article, The Denver Post quoted a source who described details of the investigation into Clements' death, based on sealed court documents. The newspaper said the source, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, had "direct access to and knowledge of the documents and the investigation itself."

The source said investigators traced Ebel to a white supremacist prison gang known as the 211 Crew, and the gang might have orchestrated Clements' killing. Federal and state authorities thought Ebel may have been recruited by gang founder Benjamin Davis to kill Clements to repay a debt, the source said. Both men had served sentences at the same time at the Sterling prison where Ebel, reportedly a member of 211 Crew, was targeted by a rival gang.

"Ebel had been threatened," the source told the Post. "Davis stepped in and saved him."

According to the source, Davis then told Ebel that he expected a favor in return once Ebel was released from prison. Clements had ordered 211 Crew members to be separated and transferred to other facilities, which may have made him a target of the gang.

Another theory considered by investigators was that Clements' killing might have been linked to his decision to deny a request by a Saudi Arabian prisoner to return to his native country to serve out the remainder of his prison sentence.

Attorneys for Homaïdan al-Turki, who was sentenced on charges of sexually assaulting his maid, denied that their client was involved in Clements' murder, but investigators said they were looking into whether there are any connections, financial or otherwise, between al-Turki and the 211 Crew.

Investigators suspected that Ebel was headed to Texas after the killings, to the home of a paroled 211 Crew member who lived south of Dallas. After Ebel was killed in the Texas police shootout, authorities found his cell phone and tracked calls he had made while on parole. He also had a hit list with the names of 20 other prison and law enforcement officials; the names on the list have not been disclosed.

Phone records confirmed that Ebel frequently contacted other 211 Crew members who had been released from prison, and that he made or received 23 calls in one 24-hour period, including the hours just before and after Clements was murdered, the source said. According to El Paso County Sheriff's Lt. Jeff Kramer, Ebel made the calls to fellow gang members.

"There's a pretty logical chain of evidence in this case," the source told The Denver Post. "It would be highly coincidental if [Ebel] had done all this on his own and there were 23 calls between him and other gang members around [the time of] Clements' murder. There is just too much there, and they are all 211 Crew members. It sounds like everything points to 211."

Then again, it's equally possible that Ebel was simply contacting people he had known in prison, which included gang members, because he had no one else to reach out to after he was released.

In March 2014, Lisa Clements said she was frustrated at how slowly the investigation into her husband's murder was progressing. She said she was concerned that the various agencies involved in the investigation were not doing enough to coordinate their efforts: "Each of them have a piece of the picture, but the whole picture is missing."

She also stated she didn't want people in Colorado to forget that authorities have not solved the case. "I realize that as impactful as Tom's life and his death was for our family, that it's human nature for the public, for us as individuals, to sort of get on with life."

"Grief takes a while," she continued. "In the days and months that followed Tom's murder, we had our hands full with all that we could do to get through days. As we've begun to address our trauma from that night, and the grief since, we perhaps in our healing process have more space to recognize anger, as well."

El Paso County Sheriff Terry Maketa said his department is determined to get to the bottom of Clements' murder.

"I want her to know that we are not going to give up. It would be really easy to say, 'We know who pulled the gun and shot Dr. Clements,'" Maketa said. "We could easily close out our case and move down the road. But that isn't the responsible thing to do."

He added, "It's just a very slow process. This isn't Hollywood."

The El Paso County Sheriff's Office is the lead agency in the investigation, which also involves the Department of Corrections (DOC), the FBI and other law enforcement officials. According to an unnamed source, in August 2013, El Paso County Judge Jonathan L. Walker, who had issued search warrants as part of the investigation into Clements' death, went into hiding due to allegations that 211 Crew leaders had placed a "hit" on him.

Who Was Evan Ebel?

EBEL HAD A WELL-DOCUMENTED HISTORY as a violent and troubled individual both before and during his time in prison. According to public records, Ebel went on a crime spree as a teenager, then a second spree which included a carjacking in 2005 that resulted in an eight-year prison sentence. After he was incarcerated his criminal behavior escalated.

On September 17, 2005, Ebel threatened to kill a female prison guard, telling her "that he would kill her if he ever saw her on the streets and that he would make her beg for her life."

Later in 2005 and again in 2006, Ebel threatened to kill staff members in two different prisons. In another incident, he threatened to beat guards if they didn't handcuff him. Overall, Ebel received 28 disciplinary charges, including four for assault and three for fighting, as well as two for disobeying direct orders. According to prison reports, he sometimes injured himself and smeared feces on his cell door and the door of another prisoner.

While in solitary, Ebel came to be known by other prisoners as "Evil Ebel." Prison records showed he was tattooed with Nazi symbols and had the word "hopeless" tattooed across his stomach and "hate" inked on his right hand.

He expressed his frustrations with the prison system through letters and poems sent to his mother and to a project called Incarcerated Voices, which provides "free speech radio by and for prisoners."

In a June 2012 poem titled "Life," Ebel wrote: "I've looked in the mirror and don't even recognize / This thing staring back at me / Though I see your death implicit in its eyes / And really that's all I care to see."

"It's clear that solitary changed him. He didn't recognize himself in the mirror," noted Dr. Scott Washington, director of advocacy for Incarcerated Voices. "Ideally, somebody would have been working with him to address those problems before he was released."

Ebel filed several grievances with prison officials while he was in solitary. "Do you have an obligation to the public to re-acclimate me, the dangerous inmate, to being around other human beings prior to being released and, if not, why?" he asked. Prison staff responded to his last grievance after he was already out, writing, "you claim that you are just looking for answer [sic] to questions about policy. Grievance Procedures is not the appropriate method for debating policy questions nor is it designed to address the policy questions you have posed."

Colorado state prisoner Troy Anderson, who served time with Ebel, said Ebel "was consumed by what they did to him."

"You know, what they do through their solitary policies is akin to rape. They steal such a precious part of our souls, our humanity, our ability to be," he added. "They committed such hateful acts on us. Through contempt and disdain they breed rage. They stole his chance at any real future."

Anderson is no stranger to solitary himself. On August 24, 2012, a Colorado federal district court held that Anderson's long-term confinement in ad-seg violated his constitutional rights. "With the exception of approximately one month in 2001 ... [Anderson] has not been out of doors for 12 years," the court wrote. Prison officials were ordered to provide him with at least one hour of outside recreation three times a week. The state did not appeal. See: Anderson v. Colorado DOC, U.S.D.C. (D. Col.), Case No. 1:10-cv-01005-RBJ-KMT.

Solitary Confinement Connection

EBEL WAS RELEASED FROM PRISON DIRECTLY from solitary confinement when he reached his mandatory parole date on January 28, 2013. A prerelease assessment said he was considered a "very high risk" for recidivism. Two months later, he cut off the ankle monitor he wore as a condition of his parole before killing Nathan Leon and then Tom Clements.

Although the investigation into Clements' death still remains open, including whether Ebel acted alone, it appears that his murder was not related to the 211 Crew or Saudi prisoner Homaidan al-Turki. Rather, the evidence points to Ebel's lengthy stay in solitary confinement and its impact on his mental health as the catalyst for Clements' murder.

According to former prisoner Ryan Pettigrew, who served time with Ebel, "This is what he planned to do as his final get-back at the system."

Ironically, Tom Clements had pushed hard for reforms during his slightly more than two-year tenure as director of the Colorado DOC. Colleagues said he was especially concerned about finding ways to eliminate the DOC's reliance on solitary confinement, particularly when it was used to control dangerous and violent prisoners such as Ebel, and to provide prisoners being released from solitary with counseling and therapy to help them successfully transition back into society.

"Evan Ebel was exactly what Tom warned us about every single day," said Roxane White, chief of staff for Governor Hickenlooper.

Indeed, the damaging effects of solitary confinement on prisoners' mental health are both well-documented and well-known; long-term isolation worsens existing psychological problems and can drive the sane insane. [See: PLN, Oct. 2012, p.1].

The American Civil Liberties Union of Colorado heaped posthumous praise on Clements for his efforts as a reform-minded prison director.

"Mr. Clements never saw a contradiction between protecting human rights, fiscal responsibility and protecting institutional security," stated ACLU staff attorney Rebecca Wallace. "He thought they all could be met simultaneously. That belief is no more clear than in his work on ad-seg."

Wallace said the ACLU, which has a history of litigation against the Colorado DOC, "didn't file a single lawsuit against the Department during Mr. Clements' tenure."

Paul Herman, a colleague and longtime friend of Clements, remarked, "Here you had two people [Ebel and Clements], one who suffered significantly from solitary confinement and the other who was trying to do something about it."

"If what happened to Tom isn't the ultimate irony," he said, "I don't know what is."

Changes Follow Clements' Death

THERE HAVE BEEN SEVERAL MAJOR CHANGES in the Colorado DOC as a result of Clements' death. As one example, The Denver Post reported on March 16, 2014 that the state's prison population has been rising due to fewer paroles being granted – an 8% decrease in paroles since before Clements was murdered. Meanwhile, the number of technical parole violations has increased and the Fugitive Apprehension Unit has captured over 400 parolees who had absconded.

Rick Raemisich, who replaced Clements as director of the Colorado DOC, said it was "human nature" that parole officials would be stricter in the wake of Clements' death. After Ebel removed his ankle monitor and absconded from parole, it took almost a week before officials sought a warrant for his arrest.

"I don't like it, but I understand it," stated Michael Dell with Colorado-CURE, a prisoners' advocacy group. "When parole board members see what happened to Tom Clements, they are not going to take a gamble on someone else."

State Parole Chief Tim Hand was placed on paid administrative leave following Clements' murder and later fired.

Further, the investigation into Clements' death determined that Ebel had been released from prison four years early due to a clerical error. A district court had failed to specify that his four-year sentence for assaulting a prison guard was to be served consecutive to his 8-year sentence for carjacking. As a result the sentences were run concurrently, leading to Ebel's early release in January 2013. His sentence had also been reduced by about four months under a law, SB11-176 – approved of by Clements – that allowed prisoners to earn good behavior credits during time spent in ad-seg.

However, Clements had opposed provisions in the original bill that would have placed restrictions on the DOC's ability to hold mentally ill prisoners in solitary.

"[Clements] was concerned about the administrative segregation population, and he asked Sen. Carroll and I to scale the bill back a little because it featured a number of requirements for the DOC to change administrative segregation," said state Rep. Claire Levy. "The original bill, for example, wanted [the DOC] to have more psychiatric resources available. They would have had to make more checks on mental health. We scaled the bill back at Clements' request."

In May 2013, Governor Hickenlooper signed into law legislation that requires the Department of Corrections to seek clarification from the court if a sentencing order does not indicate whether a sentence is to be served concurrently with or consecutive to another sentence. The DOC has two business days to request clarification and the court has two days to respond.

Hickenlooper also ordered an audit to determine whether clerical errors had resulted in other erroneous early releases. By August 2013, judges had reviewed 1,514 cases and corrected the sentences for 267 prisoners. Nine who had already been released were returned to prison to serve out their full terms.

Most notably, there have been changes in the Colorado DOC's use of ad-seg and the number of prisoners released directly from solitary to the community. According to Raemisch, the DOC's ad-seg population has declined from 1,511 in 2011 to 590 as of March 2014. The number of prisoners released from prison directly from solitary has dropped from 70 last year to just one or two a month in early 2014.

"We have people that are well trained on how to handle dangerous people, and yet we felt they are too dangerous to be in general population, so we'll put them in administrative segregation and then, 'oh by the way,' release them into the community. It just doesn't make any sense," Raemisch said.

In fact, Raemisch spent a day locked in an ad-seg cell at the Colorado State Penitentiary to see what it was like – an experience that led him to curtail the use of solitary confinement, particularly for prisoners with mental health problems. [See article in this issue of PLN, p. 8].

There was still room for improvement, however.

A report issued by the Colorado ACLU in July 2013 found that prison officials continued "to rely on long-term solitary confinement to manage mentally ill prisoners, often for months or even years." The report, titled "Out of Sight, Out of Mind," noted that during Tom Clements' tenure the Colorado DOC started the Residential Treatment Program (RTP) to provide treatment to mentally ill prisoners. However, according to ACLU public policy director Denise Maes, "The information that we're getting is that RTP looks very much like ad-seg."

A December 10, 2013 memo issued by the DOC stated that wardens were no longer allowed to place prisoners with a "major mental illnesses" in solitary.

"This is an enormous foundational step toward getting seriously mentally ill prisoners out of solitary confinement and into treatment," stated ACLU staff attorney Rebecca Wallace. "There is still more important work to be done, but we want to take this moment to recognize something we have been asking the Department of Corrections to do for years."

Still, the policy change did not apply to prisoners who have mental health problems but have not been diagnosed with a “major” mental illness.

“As an initial matter, we remain concerned that the definition of major mental illness adopted by the [Colorado DOC] is too narrow and that there are still prisoners in administrative segregation who are seriously mentally ill and should not be placed in prolonged solitary confinement,” the ACLU stated.

In April 2014, the Colorado General Assembly passed a bill, SB14-064, that would make it more difficult to place mentally ill prisoners in solitary absent exigent circumstances; the bill had passed the senate unanimously.

“Today’s vote moves Colorado one step closer to realizing the former director’s stated desire of bringing greater safety to the public and humanity to the prisons by ending our state’s historic over-reliance on solitary confinement,” the Colorado ACLU said in a statement.

The bill was signed into law by Governor Hickenlooper on June 6, 2014. “[A]s of today, we have no offenders with mental illness in solitary confinement,” said a spokesman for the DOC. Colorado was the second state – after New York – to enact legislation to remove mentally ill prisoners from solitary.

Conclusion

AS A POSTSCRIPT TO CLEMENTS’ MURDER, authorities investigated where Ebel had obtained the 9mm handgun he used to kill Clements and Leon. They discovered the gun had been purchased by Stevie Marie Anne Vigil, a childhood friend of Ebel’s, who gave it to him shortly before the killings. Vigil pleaded guilty to providing a firearm to a convicted felon, and on March 3, 2014 she was sentenced to 27 months in federal prison. There was no evidence that she knew Ebel had planned to use the gun to commit the murders.

Ultimately, no one escaped the damaging consequences of Ebel’s actions – not Vigil, nor the families of Tom Clements and Nathan Leon, nor Texas deputy James Boyd or the Colorado prisoners who now have a more difficult time making parole, nor Ebel himself and his family members.

“I’m angry at the horrific senselessness,” said Lisa Clements. “I’m angry that it impacted not just one individual [but also] our entire family, our community, our friends, our neighbors, our loved ones.”

While “Evil” Evan Ebel has been vilified for murdering Clements, and an investigation continues into the possible involvement of the 211 Crew prison gang, few have condemned the Colorado DOC’s treatment of mentally ill prisoners and use of long-term ad-seg as factors that directly contributed to Clements’ death. As Ebel himself had said, the prison system creates monsters; thus, society should not be surprised when those monsters are released with predictable results.

“In Colorado, by using solitary confinement as the default for mentally ill prisoners, we’re doing the least safe thing for the most amount of money,” observed state Senator Jessie Ulibarri. “The case of Evan Ebel and Tom Clements is the most extreme example of that.”

Two Corrections Chiefs Serve Time in Segregation

by Christopher Zoukis

RICK RAEMISCH, COLORADO'S new corrections director, wanted to better understand the experience of solitary confinement – so he spent a night in segregation at a state prison.

Raemisch had been on the job for seven months when he decided to stay overnight in an ad seg cell at the Colorado State Penitentiary. "I thought he was crazy," said Warden Travis Trani, who added, "I also admired him for wanting to have the experience." Trani received only nine hours notice that his boss was arriving for an extended visit.

On January 23, 2014, just after 7:00 p.m., Raemisch, handcuffed and shackled and wearing a prison uniform, entered cell 22. He was classified as "RFP," or "Removed From Population." After being uncuffed through the food slot he was left alone in the 7-by-13-foot cell.

In an editorial published in The New York Times on February 20, Raemisch said the experience was challenging.

"First thing you notice is that it's anything but quiet. You're immersed in a drone of garbled noise: other inmates, blaring TVs, distant conversations, shouted arguments. I couldn't make sense of any of it, and was left feeling twitchy and paranoid," he wrote. "I kept waiting for the lights to turn off, to signal the end of the day. But the lights did not shut off. I began to count the small holes carved in the walls. Tiny grooves made by inmates who'd chipped away at the cell as the cell chipped away at them. For a sound mind, those are daunting circumstances. But every prison in America has become a dumping ground for the mentally ill, and often the 'worst of the worst,' some of society's most unsound minds, are dumped in Ad Seg."

Raemisch then described some of the day-to-day routine that prisoners in solitary endure for years – sometimes decades.

"[T]here were the counts. According to the Ad Seg rules, within every 24-hour period there are five scheduled counts and at least two random ones. They are announced over the intercom and prisoners must stand with their feet visible to the officer as he looks through the door's small window. As executive director, I praise the dedication, but as someone trying to sleep and rest my mind, forget it. I learned later that a number of inmates make earplugs out of toilet paper.... When 6:15 a.m. and breakfast finally came, I brushed my teeth, washed my face, did two sets of push-ups, and made my bed. I looked out my small window, saw that it was still dark outside, and thought, now what?"

Raemisch said that by 11:30 a.m. the next day, he broke a promise to himself and asked a guard what time it was. "I felt like I had been there for days. I sat with my mind. How long would it take before Ad Seg chipped that away? I don't know, but I'm confident that it would be a battle I would lose," he wrote.

After Raemisch, 61, took over as Colorado's top prison official following the murder of his predecessor, Tom Clements, by a prisoner who was released directly from solitary, he decided to continue Clements' efforts to curtail the use of long-term segregation. Clements had reduced Colorado's solitary population from about 1,500 to 726; Raemisch has since cut that number to under 600.

Raemisch shared his experience at a U.S. Senate subcommittee hearing on the topic of solitary confinement in February 2014, saying segregation was "overused, misused, and abused" in America's prisons. His comments were received by many well-wishers, including officials with the ACLU, who joked that other corrections commissioners might want to take "the Colorado challenge."

Predictably, some criticized Raemisch for being "soft" on criminals or for trying to grandstand through his brief stint in solitary.

Raemisch said he was moved by the experience. "Everything you know about treating human beings, [segregation's] not the way to do it," he stated. "When I finally left my cell at 3 p.m., I felt even more urgency for reform. If we can't eliminate solitary confinement, at least we can strive to greatly reduce its use. Knowing that 97 percent of inmates are ultimately returned to their communities, doing anything less would be both counterproductive and inhumane."

Raemisch spent just 20 hours in segregation – a short time, but long enough to make a lasting impression. On average, Colorado prisoners sent to solitary stay 23 months.

At least one other corrections chief has served time in segregation to gain empirical experience of what it's like. On May 2, 2014, New Mexico Corrections Department Secretary Gregg Marcantel, 53, entered cell 106 in E pod at the state penitentiary in Santa Fe for a 48-hour visit.

"I can tell you, pacing it, I had five large paces from the edge of my bed to the door. I traveled that route quite a bit," he said. "It's where I ate, where I exercised, where my toilet was. I didn't, for 48 hours, speak a word. I did internal dialog, but I didn't speak a word to another person."

Marcantel said he wanted the experience to be as authentic as possible, even though he knew it was for only a short time. He spent the first day under conditions of administrative seg and the last day in disciplinary segregation.

"There are just things sometimes that you gotta feel, you gotta taste, and you gotta hear and you gotta smell," he noted.

Although he tried to play the part – arriving in restraints, wearing prison clothes, growing a beard to hide his appearance and pretending to be deaf and mute so he wouldn't have to speak – other prisoners in the unit became suspicious and assumed he was a cop.

Marcantel said it got "ugly" and "tense."

His brief time in solitary was recorded on a video camera as he paced, read books, looked out the cell window and ate prison food.

"You start after a while to count everything, because that's how you kind of grab a little bit of control," he observed. "You become a lot more detail-oriented about what your environment looks like."

Marcantel said he made several policy changes based on his experience in segregation; according to one news report, 60 to 80 New Mexico state prisoners have since been moved from solitary confinement to the general prison population. ■

From the Editor

by Paul Wright

SINCE WE BEGAN PUBLISHING PLN IN 1990 we have documented the horrific effects of solitary confinement and its overall goal and purpose of psychologically destroying prisoners subjected to long-term isolation. It's not a coincidence that the rise of solitary confinement in the U.S. began in the 1970s just as American courts were ending the use of corporal punishment as a form of discipline by prison officials. For example, as recently as the early 1970s prisoners were still being flogged with leather straps in Tennessee and Arkansas.

The rise of solitary confinement also coincided with the successful use of long-term isolation and sensory deprivation by the U.S. as a torture and interrogation technique against freedom fighters and anti-imperialists in Vietnam, South America and elsewhere. What began as a counter-insurgency tactic overseas is now routinely used against an estimated 80,000 U.S. prisoners on a daily basis – the vast majority of whom harbor no animus toward the government that imprisons them but are simply a little too poor, a little too mentally ill, not law abiding enough or not subservient enough to stay out of prison or, once incarcerated, to avoid being placed in solitary. As states and the federal government spent billions to build supermax prisons, it was no surprise they would be filled with whoever was available to fill them.

Colorado was among the states that invested in solitary confinement as a means of controlling – and torturing – prisoners. After decades of using long-term segregation, it appeared there was some modest hope for change when Tom Clements was appointed director of the Colorado DOC and began to curtail the use of solitary.

I met Clements at a conference on supermax prisons several years ago at Columbia Law School, where we were both speakers. He discussed his efforts to reduce the use of isolation in Colorado, which had already been moderately successful. He seemed genuinely committed to the notion of reform; therefore, it was all the more shocking and ironic that he would be killed by a prisoner recently released from solitary confinement. This month's cover story delves behind the headlines of Clements' death into the background of his killer, Evan Ebel, and the repercussions that followed.

This issue of PLN also includes a poem by renowned poet Maya Angelou, who passed away on May 28, 2014. In addition to being a poet she was at various times homeless, a lounge singer, a pimp, a prostitute, a victim of child rape – all of which influenced her work – and had demonstrated by the time of her death that she was much more, by serving as a powerful voice for the voiceless. Several of her poems are especially meaningful for people behind bars, such as "Prisoner" and "Caged Bird." The world will be a more somber place without her poetry but is more illuminated because of it.

Each year we spend a great deal of money sending sample copies of PLN to potential subscribers in the hope they will subscribe. From now until the end of the year we are running our Subscription Madness campaign, whereby people can purchase multiple one-year subscriptions to PLN for individuals who have not subscribed before, at reduced rates.

Our hope is that after receiving PLN for a year, people will want to renew at our regular rates. The Subscription Madness rates do not apply to current or former subscribers – only those who have never subscribed previously. The goal is to introduce new people to PLN. This is a great time to purchase subscriptions for your favorite judges, legislators, corrections officials, prisoners, family members or anyone else who you think needs to learn more about the realities of mass incarceration and its impact on our nation. See the ad on p. 51.

Our fight against prison and jail censorship continues. As this issue goes to press we are awaiting a decision in our challenge to system-wide censorship of PLN by the Florida DOC that has been ongoing since 2009. We are currently litigating the censorship of PLN books by the Nevada DOC and are challenging postcard-only policies and book and magazine bans by jails in Florida, Georgia, California, Washington, Tennessee, Michigan, Arizona and Virginia. Within the past month we have successfully concluded lawsuits against jails in Wisconsin and Texas. If you are a PLN subscriber or purchase books from PLN, please let us know if you experience censorship of any PLN reading materials. We are dedicated to ensuring that prisoners anywhere in the U.S. can receive PLN and the books we distribute. All too often, prison and jail officials fail to notify us of censorship decisions; thus, we rely on our readers to keep us informed so we can take appropriate action.

Enjoy this issue of PLN, and please encourage others to subscribe and to participate in Subscription Madness! 📖

In Remembrance of Maya Angelou

(April 4, 1928 – May 28, 2014)

Caged Bird

by Maya Angelou

A free bird leaps on the back of the wind and floats downstream till the current ends and dips his wing in the orange sun rays and dares to claim the sky.

But a bird that stalks down his narrow cage can seldom see through his bars of rage his wings are clipped and his feet are tied so he opens his throat to sing.

The caged bird sings
with a fearful trill
of things unknown
but longed for still and his tune is heard on the distant hill for the caged bird
sings of freedom.

The free bird thinks of another breeze and the trade winds soft through the sighing trees and the fat worms waiting on a dawn bright lawn and he names the sky his own.

But a caged bird stands on the grave of dreams his shadow shouts on a nightmare scream his wings are clipped and his feet are tied so he opens his throat to sing.

The caged bird sings
with a fearful trill
of things unknown
but longed for still and his tune is heard on the distant hill for the caged bird
sings of freedom.

Bonnie Kerness: Pioneer in the Struggle Against Solitary Confinement

by Lance Tapley

IN 1986, OJORE LUTALO, A BLACK revolutionary in Trenton State Prison – now the New Jersey State Prison – wrote to Bonnie Kerness’ American Friends Service Committee (AFSC) office in Newark. His letter described the extreme isolation and other brutalities in the prison’s Management Control Unit (MCU), which he called a “prison within a prison.”

“I could not believe what he was telling me” about the MCU, Kerness says. She reacted by becoming “this lunatic white lady” calling New Jersey corrections officials about Lutalo.

She immediately went to work trying to stop MCU guards from harassing prisoners by waking them at 1 a.m. to make them strip in front of snarling dogs leaping for their genitals – to arbitrarily have them switch cells. She got this practice stopped.

Lutalo’s letter also began to open her eyes to the torture of solitary confinement, which in the mid-1980s was just starting to spread across the country as a mass penological practice. Coordinator of the AFSC’s national Prison Watch Project, Kerness had worked on prison issues since the mid-1970s. Now she became an anti-solitary confinement activist. She has been one longer and more consistently than, possibly, anyone else.

“I try not to use the word ‘pioneer’ lightly,” says David Fathi, director of the American Civil Liberties Union’s National Prison Project, “but it certainly applies to Bonnie. She did the groundwork for the progress and success we are now having.”

Corey Weinstein, a California physician who also was a pioneering activist against solitary confinement, says Kerness made a huge contribution early on by bringing a human rights vision to the effort. It provided “the intellectual framework that we could grasp onto” to understand what was happening.

Reflecting on how difficult it has been for solitary confinement to be publicly recognized as torture, Stuart Grassian, a Massachusetts psychiatrist – another trailblazer who is credited with identifying long-term isolation as the cause of a devastating psychiatric syndrome – observes: “How frightening it is to see people choose not to see what’s in front of them.”

Many years ago Bonnie Kerness chose to see what was in front of her.

A Child Shocked by Injustice

KERNESS IS VERY SLIM, LOOKS MUCH younger than 69, and dresses stylishly – though her wardrobe is purchased at thrift shops, she says. She makes sweeping gestures when she speaks in her East Coast urban twang.

Born in Manhattan, she grew up in the Bronx and Queens. Her working-class family was not political, but at 12 years old she was shocked to see on the television news “kids my own age” being beaten for trying to integrate schools in the South. This glimpse of injustice would lead to her life’s work.

When she was 14, in 1956, she began doing volunteer social work in the Lower East Side, where for the first time she met community organizers. Five years later she became one herself, traveling the South for the civil rights movement, working with the NAACP and other groups.

She portrays herself then as “a young white kid who went south with very little political understanding.” But in addition to on-the-job training, she received what might be called an elite community-organizing graduate-school education: a year in the mid-1960s at Tennessee’s Highlander Research and Education Center, formerly the Highlander Folk School, a legendary social justice leadership school which Rosa Parks and Martin Luther King had attended.

“I have a special feeling for my generation,” Kerness says – the activist sixties’ generation. “We each had something outside of ourselves” to be devoted to.

In the early 1970s she went up from the South to New Jersey and got work with the AFSC in a housing campaign. She and others noticed that many poor people had a father or other family member in prison. This perception led to the founding of a New Jersey prisoner-rights effort that ultimately morphed into the Prison Watch Project.

In her teenage years in Queens, she had completed two years of college. She began taking courses again, eventually getting a master's in social work from Rutgers. She also became active in the women's, gay rights and anti-Vietnam War movements.

And she married and divorced. She has three biological children, an adopted child and "one of my lovers had three African-American children" she helped raise. Now she attends to seven young people she all calls her grandchildren – one of whom interrupts an interview in the tidy AFSC office in gritty downtown Newark with a call to grandma to ask if she will pay for a pizza with her credit card.

Kerness' life outside her work – half-time, theoretically, now that she's officially retired – revolves around her grandchildren.

The Discovery of Solitary Confinement

AFTER LUTALO'S LETTER REVEALED THE horrors of the Trenton MCU, to better understand the control-unit phenomenon Kerness got in touch with the Committee to End the Marion Lockdown. In 1983 the United States Penitentiary in Marion, Illinois became the first prison in modern times to adopt near-total confinement of all prisoners to their cells – thus, the first supermax.

Kerness credits Nancy Kurshan, a prominent sixties' and seventies' radical and founder of the Marion anti-lockdown group, with helping guide her initial work, as did several former Marion prisoners. Kerness soon founded the AFSC's Control Unit Monitoring Project, focusing first on the 80 to 90 African-American politicized prisoners in the Trenton unit.

As she began getting letters from prisoners in other states who told stories similar to Lutalo's, she contacted organizations around the country that were beginning to be alarmed by the rise of these draconian units. This new kind of imprisonment seemed so bizarre, "People weren't sure what they were looking at," Kerness says.

And while she worked to build opposition to solitary confinement, she saw it rapidly become common. Only a handful of sizeable control units existed in the mid-1980s, but fewer than 15 years later more than 40 states had them. Many were large, free-standing supermax prisons.

Kerness also watched in dismay as control units and supermaxes became dumpsters into which society threw the mentally ill. The arbitrariness of the supermax regimen became clear. "You're there because we want you there," she says of the ultimate criterion for who is put into isolation.

As citizen campaigns specifically against control units began popping up spontaneously, Kerness made connections with them and helped them – in California, Wisconsin, Illinois, Massachusetts. In 1994, she helped bring 40 activists from around the country to the AFSC offices in Philadelphia to found the National Campaign to Stop Control Unit Prisons, which held public meetings on solitary confinement in several states.

Solitary: First Among Other Issues

KERNESS HAS BEEN INVOLVED WITH many other prison issues, including sexual abuse, restraint chairs and beds, the overuse of stun guns and pepper spray, and prison privatization.

Her work has been particularly devoted to solitary confinement, she says, because “we’re so well known on this issue.” Her daily duties include answering mail and telephone calls, sending out reams of requested material, contacting the news media, mentoring student interns, giving talks to college and community groups, and writing articles and reports.

Her AFSC reports include, as editor or author: “The Prison Inside the Prison: Control Units, Supermax Prisons, and Devices of Torture” (with Rachael Kamel, 2003); “Survivors Manual: Surviving in Solitary” (4th Printing, 2008); and “Torture in United States Prisons: Evidence of Human Rights Violations” (Second Edition, 2011).

Although she praises several Quaker activists who encouraged her, she expresses frustration with the AFSC for starting national anti-solitary confinement campaigns only to shut them down.

After four years the AFSC unaccountably “pulled the plug,” she says, on the National Campaign to Stop Control Unit Prisons. Similarly, after a well-attended “StopMAX” conference in Philadelphia in 2008, the substantial national effort that was supposed to grow out of it never materialized.

An official at the AFSC’s national headquarters in Philadelphia, Clinton Pettus, says the organization, “like most nonprofits, went through a period of financial constraint a few years ago,” and was forced “to do more with less” in its solitary confinement work. The result: “We partner with like-minded groups and individuals to form state-based coalitions that build grassroots campaigns.”

Kerness also generally faults the national organizations involved with prison reform for not making better connections between the American domestic prison system and the American foreign war machine. The organizations don’t recognize, she says, that there’s a worldwide class and racist oppression coming from the top of the economic pyramid.

“The people who run the country own the means of production,” she says, and this rich elite is ultimately responsible for the “war against the people here” – which she sees as a campaign of social control – and American wars against the people of other countries. Both here and abroad, the primary targets are black and brown people. [Ed. note: Plus poor people in general].

A Partner in Activism

KERNESS BEGAN HELPING OJORE LUTALO in 1986, but he has been, during the many years he spent on the inside, and since 2009, when he was released from prison, a professional partner in conveying to the world the horrors of solitary confinement.

He has vast knowledge of the subject. He spent 22 of his 28 years behind bars in isolation in the Trenton MCU. Now 66 – strong-looking, with a shaved head – he volunteers twice a week in the AFSC Newark office at a desk across a small room from Kerness. And he speaks beside her when she goes to colleges and community groups.

Lutalo got in touch with Kerness to protest what he says were the prison’s “corrupt” practices, including inadequate food and medical care and arbitrary denials of visitors. But the corruption also was more fundamental. Lutalo spent so many years in solitary, he says in an interview, not because he broke prison rules but for “entertaining political thoughts the administration didn’t approve of.”

He presents proof, showing a 2008 letter from prison officials stating he was being kept in the MCU because his “radical views and ability to influence others poses a threat to the orderly operation of this Institution.” Serving time for armed robbery and assault with intent to kill, he had been a member of the Black Liberation Army, an underground, revolutionary offshoot of the Black Panthers.

Kerness has written of Lutalo: “During the quarter century that we monitored Ojore Lutalo in isolation, he was never assaulted either physically or chemically. The ‘no-touch’ torture he endured consisted of sleep deprivation, screeching sounds, extreme silence, extreme cold and heat, intentional situational placement, humiliation – a systematic attack

“The goal was to break me psychologically,” Lutalo says.

He didn’t break. But maintaining sanity during decades of solitary confinement is exceedingly difficult, he says. He saw many prisoners “wiped out” by the isolation. He says his political commitment kept him sane. His creation of political art – collages that combine drawings and newspaper clippings – was especially helpful.

With Kerness’ assistance, Lutalo’s plight and the conditions at the MCU became known. Reporters interviewed him; documentary films appeared; a class-action lawsuit was filed on behalf of the unit’s African-American prisoners. In 1995 the lawsuit was settled, and the court appointed a special master to review each prisoner’s case.

Eventually, after years, most prisoners were released into the prison’s general population. Lutalo spent several years in general population, but was put back into the MCU because, Kerness says an official told her, of a request by the federal Department of Homeland Security. He was released from isolation only when his prison term ended.

A Harsh State

ALTHOUGH KERNESS’ WORK HAS OFTEN been on the national stage, the Trenton MCU has continued to be a major concern. The state’s prison system has “always been one of the toughest” on prisoners, she says, and the MCU is still being used “unconscionably” for mentally ill prisoners. But, she adds, it’s difficult to know what’s going on in it and anywhere else in “an extremely closed” New Jersey system.

As if to prove that point, when the New Jersey Department of Corrections is asked about the number of prisoners held in solitary confinement, a spokesman replies by email: “New Jersey does not utilize solitary confinement in any of its prisons.”

This is a common response from corrections departments, since “solitary confinement” is not a bureaucratic phrase. Further inquiry produces an admission that “administrative segregation (ad seg) ... is utilized as a punishment for inmates and entails the loss or reduction of certain privileges.” The spokesman, Matthew Schuman, adds that “the vast majority of inmates in ad seg are double-bunked. Even those in single cells have opportunities to interact with other inmates, so ad seg is distinctly different from solitary confinement.”

Kerness, however, counts over 329 ad seg beds at the Trenton prison that “we’re pretty sure are isolation cells.” In addition, she’s “positive” there are 96 solitary confinement cells in the MCU. Ad seg beds in four other prisons total 994, she says. These may or may not be doubled-bunked, but they’re “locked down.” Then there are special needs and protective custody housing units about which, she says, little is known.

Jean Ross, a volunteer prisoners’ rights attorney based in Princeton, agrees with Kerness that New Jersey’s prison system is unhelpful in providing information, isolates many prisoners and is a harsh system.

Ross has specifically challenged, in a class-action lawsuit on behalf of prisoners, the conditions in the “falling apart” West Compound of the 178-year-old Trenton facility. Ross says it has poor ventilation, excessive heat and cold, leaking pipes, rodent and insect infestations, and fire-safety deficiencies, among other problems.

Kerness also was involved in bringing to light the particularly vicious conditions that alleged gang members suffered in a “high risk” Security Threat Group Management Unit of Newark’s huge Northern State Prison. Reports of the “use of physical, chemical, and psychological abuse” came to her “during the entire 12 years” the gang unit remained open, she writes in “Torture in United States Prisons.”

The unit was shut down in 2010 after prisoner Omar Broadway, a Bloods gang member, used a camera smuggled in by a guard to secretly film abusive treatment of prisoners. His video, with scenes of guards pepper-spraying and beating prisoners, was shown at the 2008 Tribeca Film Festival and, in 2010, on HBO. Kerness says many of the Northern State prisoners were transferred to ad seg units in other New Jersey prisons.

The Future of Anti-solitary Work

KERNESS WELCOMES THE EMBRACE IN recent years of the anti-solitary cause by mainstream groups such as the National Religious Campaign Against Torture – “they’re doing dynamite.” She believes describing solitary confinement as torture is the angle to accentuate. She has written that American legitimization of torture presents the country with “a spiritual crisis.”

She sees welcome developments, too, in law schools, especially with their students. She hopes “we will begin to see lawyers with a more progressive” bent. At present, progressive lawyers are “still a very small group.”

But most important to the anti-solitary battle, she says, are “the people inside,” such as Lutalo, who stimulated her activism.

As for her future, “I wouldn’t know how else to live,” Kerness says, other than a life of activism, despite the slowness of change. Years ago, “I almost did give it up because I was alone.” That was “right at the moment I met Ojore.”

Hers has been a difficult crusade, too, because it’s “always been a struggle financially.” To be an activist for social change “costs money personally” – those collect calls received at home from prisoners, for example.

In a telephone interview, Ross, who has worked with Kerness on prison issues for 10 years, sums her up: “She’s very smart. She’s very articulate. She writes very well because she thinks very well. She has a passion for justice. She’s not afraid to confront the most difficult problems.”

Later, by email, Ross adds: “Because she has persisted in this difficult and stressful work for so long, she brings the wisdom of memory.”

Kerness says she’s not discouraged, but she’s no Pollyanna about ending widespread solitary confinement. During her decades of work on prison issues she saw the American prison system become ever more repressive. “I can only hope,” she says of the future.

Whatever the future, “I will spend as much time as I can” working on these issues. “If there’s activism in you, you do it until you drop.” ■

Preliminary Injunction Entered in PLN Censorship Suit Against Ventura County, California

ON MAY 29, 2014, IN A SIGNIFICANT victory for the First Amendment rights of prisoners and those who correspond with them, the U.S. District Court for the Central District of California granted a preliminary injunction barring Ventura County’s jail system from enforcing a “postcard only” policy that prohibits prisoners from receiving mail in envelopes.

“We are very pleased the judge is upholding the constitution,” said Prison Legal News editor Paul Wright.

The preliminary injunction was the latest in a series of successful legal actions filed by PLN challenging unduly restrictive mail policies implemented in jails nationwide, which courts have repeatedly found are not justified by a rational penological purpose. [See: PLN, Jan. 2014, p.42; Nov.

2013, p.24; Sept. 2013, p.40].

After considering the parties’ arguments, the federal district court found that Ventura County’s “restrictive mail policies violate [PLN’s] First Amendment right to communicate with inmates,” and that the jail system’s “practice of rejecting mail without providing notice and an opportunity to appeal” violates the Fourteenth Amendment.

The court ordered the defendants to “suspend enforcement of the postcard-only policy for incoming mail within 21 days” and “give senders of rejected mail written notice and an opportunity to appeal the rejection decision.” Further, the jail “shall not reject mail for containing ‘suggestive’ content, Xeroxed material, or subscription order forms.”

The district court noted that “[p]ublishers have a First Amendment right to communicate with prisoners by mail,” citing Prison Legal News v. Lehman, 397 F.3d 692 (9th Cir. 2000).

In analyzing PLN’s motion for a preliminary injunction, the court applied the test set forth in Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78 (1987), examining four factors to determine whether a regulation is “reasonably related to legitimate penological interests.”

Although Ventura County cited security concerns to justify its postcard-only policy, the district court wrote that “our deference to the administrative expertise and discretionary authority of correctional officials must be schooled, not absolute.”

The court noted the county jail system had allowed prisoners to receive mail in envelopes until 2011, and had presented no evidence indicating it could not do so again because, as with letters, it still had to inspect postcards for contraband. Further, most other federal, state and county correctional facilities allow prisoners to receive mail in envelopes without compromising institutional security.

The district court held the county had not met its burden to show a rational basis for its postcard-only policy in light of the policy’s obvious impact on PLN’s First Amendment rights, citing Prison Legal News v. Columbia County, 942 F.Supp.2d 1068 (D. Or. 2013) [PLN, June 2013, p.42].

In granting the preliminary injunction, the court determined, based upon the evidence presented, that PLN was likely to prevail on the merits in the case – a clear victory for the First Amendment rights of not only prisoners and publications such as PLN, but also for the free-flow of information and correspondence between people who are incarcerated and their friends, family members and others on the outside.

PLN is represented by the San Francisco law firm of Rosen Bien Galvan & Grunfeld, LLP and attorney Brian Vogel. The case remains pending. See: Prison Legal News v. County of Ventura, U.S.D.C. (C.D. Cal.), Case No. 2:14-cv-00773-GHK-E. ■

Oregon Parole Board: "Don't Have to Explain Nothing to Nobody"

FOR AT LEAST THE FIFTH TIME, A STATE court has ordered the Oregon Board of Parole and Post-Prison Supervision (Board) to provide more than boilerplate reasons for its decisions. There is little reason to believe, however, that the Board has any intention of complying.

Oregon law requires the Board to "state in writing the detailed bases of its decisions." The Board is exempt, however, from a statutory requirement to make findings of fact and conclusions of law.

The Oregon Court of Appeals reversed a Board decision in 1997, holding that despite the statutory exemption, the Board was required to "make findings of fact and provide an explanation as to why its findings lead to the conclusions that it reaches." See: Martin v. Board of Parole, 147 Ore. App. 37, 934 P.2d 626 (Or. Ct. App. 1997). The Oregon Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the Board must provide "some kind of an explanation connecting the facts of the case (which would include the facts found, if any) and the result reached." See: Martin v. Board of Parole, 327 Ore. 147, 957 P.2d 1210 (Or. 1998). This is commonly referred to as "the substantial-reason requirement."

In 1999, the Board asked the Oregon legislature to overrule Martin. The proposed law change expressly relieved the Board of a duty to "explain how [its] order is supported by the facts and the evidence in the record."

The Oregon judiciary, however, did not appreciate such overt disrespect for its authority. James Nass, appellate legal counsel for the Oregon Supreme Court and Court of Appeals, opposed the Board's proposed legislation, SB 401.

As the bill advanced through the legislature, the judiciary's opposition grew "more vociferous." Nass called the bill "bad public policy" and warned it "will decrease the quality of judicial review" and "increase the work load of the appellate courts."

He pulled no punches. "There is nothing subtle about this bill," he said. "The bill starkly presents this policy issue: Should any governmental agency be exempt from explaining how its decisions are supported by the evidence in the record? Apparently these Boards would say yes. Under SB 401, their motto would be: 'We're the Board. We don't have to explain nothing to nobody.'"

Nass continued: "According to these Boards, they shouldn't have to explain their decisions to inmates whose fates lie in their hands. No problem there, of course, because few people have sympathy for criminals. But, this bill also means that the Boards would not have to explain their decisions to victims or victims' families. They would not have to explain their decisions to the media. They wouldn't have to explain their decisions to any legislator who might be interested in a particular case. And, they wouldn't have to explain their decisions to the courts to aid in judicial review of those decisions."

In the end, a compromise was struck between Oregon's Attorney General, the Chief Justice of the Oregon Supreme Court and the judge who authored the Martin decision. The proposed bill was gutted and replaced with a single sentence that was added to ORS 144.335(3): "The order of the board need not be in any special form, and the order is sufficient for purposes of judicial review if it appears that the board acted within the scope of the board's authority."

Apparently believing the legislation allowed it to conduct business as usual, the Board continued to offer only boilerplate reasons for its parole decisions.

On December 28, 2007, the Oregon Supreme Court again reminded the Board of its responsibility under Martin – i.e., to set forth in its orders the reasoning that leads from the facts it has found to the conclusions it draws from those facts. See: Gordon v. Board of Parole, 343 Ore. 618, 175 P.3d 461 (Or. 2007).

Just fourteen days later, a trial court granted a victim's request to vacate a decision by the Board to release the man imprisoned for raping her. Relying in part on Gordon, the court held that the Board's "bare conclusions are simply not enough... the Board's findings, reasoning, and conclusions must demonstrate that it acted in a rational, fair, and principled manner, and not on an arbitrary or ad hoc basis."

Steven R. Powers, then Board Chairman and now Deputy General Counsel to Oregon Governor John Kitzhaber, defended the Board's standard language in its decisions, claiming that detailed findings could give prisoners more ammunition for appeals.

Bronson James, the public defender who represented the prisoner whose release was vacated following a legal challenge by the rape victim, said that offenders and their attorneys shared the objections voiced by the victim and her lawyer.

"We have been complaining for decades with nobody taking us seriously," James said in August 2008.

He argued then that the Board should "issue detailed rulings that explain why it denied parole rather than the typical two-sentence decision that includes nothing but boilerplate reasoning."

The Board's response, however, indicated that it still took the position that it didn't "have to explain nothing to nobody."

On November 18, 2009, the Oregon Court of Appeals again reversed a parole decision, finding the Board had violated the substantial-reason requirement. Citing the same boilerplate language that was found in every Board order, the appellate court said, "the board has provided only a conclusion: 'Based on the doctor's report and diagnosis, coupled with all the information that the board is considering, it is reasonably probable that petitioner would violate his parole or a law.... That is an announcement, not an explanation. It gives us nothing to judicially review. Our duty is to evaluate the board's logic, not to supply it.'" See: Castro v. Board of Parole, 232 Ore. App. 75, 220 P.3d 772 (Or. Ct. App. 2009).

Of course, nothing changed – the Board did not make even the slightest variation in its standard language.

On September 5, 2013, the Court of Appeals once again held that the Board is required "to provide an inmate with some explanation of the rationale for concluding that" release on parole should be postponed.

Rejecting the Board's argument that the 1999 "Martin amendment" exempts it from the substantial-reason requirement, the appellate court concluded that the Board's "reading of the statute runs counter to its text, context, and legislative history."

Following Martin, Gordon and Castro, the Court of Appeals wrote "that the board used the same boilerplate wording rejected in Castro," and held "it is apparent that the board's order references the contents of the entire record, as opposed to particular parts of the record that were pivotal." As such, "the order ... offers a mere conclusion and does not permit us 'to determine if the board's findings, reasoning, and conclusions demonstrate that it acted in a rational, fair, and principled manner in deciding to defer petitioner's parole release.'" One appellate judge dissented from the majority opinion. See: Jenkins v. Board of Parole, 258 Ore. App. 430, 309 P.3d 1115 (Or. Ct. App. 2013).

Given that the Board has repeatedly ignored two state Supreme Court decisions, a previous Court of Appeals decision and a trial court order on this very issue, there is little reason to believe that yet another judicial ruling is going to alter its behavior.

Apparently the rule of law and the authority of the courts mean little when you're the Board and believe you "don't have to explain nothing to nobody."

However, the Oregon Supreme Court, which granted review in Jenkins on January 30, 2014, may have the final word regarding the Board's reasoning for its decisions. ■

Prisoners Unlikely to Benefit from New, Highly Effective Hepatitis C Treatment

by Greg Dober

HEPATITIS C (HCV) IS A BLOOD-BORNE virus that is typically spread through intravenous drug use (i.e., sharing needles), tattooing with non-sterile needles, and sharing razors, toothbrushes, nail clippers or other hygiene items that may be exposed to blood. It is often a chronic disease and, if left untreated, can lead to severe liver damage.

Recent good news in the battle against HCV, in the form of two new drugs that are highly effective in eliminating the virus, is tempered by the fact that the companies that produce the drugs have priced them at $60,000 to $80,000 per 12-week course of treatment. This high cost prices the medications beyond the reach of most prison and jail systems – which is especially troubling considering that a substantial number of prisoners are infected with HCV.

The new drugs, approved by the FDA in late 2013, are simeprevir, branded as Olysio and manufactured by Janssen Therapeutics (a Johnson & Johnson company), and sofosbuvir, branded as Sovaldi and manufactured by Gilead Sciences. Based on clinical trials, Sovaldi has an 84-96% cure rate while Olysio has an 80-85% cure rate. Both drugs are used in combination with other HCV anti-viral medications, peginterferon alfa and/or ribavirin, and their cure rates vary depending on HCV genotype – specific variations of the virus.

Unlike the current treatments for hepatitis C, Olysio and Sovaldi have fewer side effects, greater efficacy and reduce treatment durations by up to 75% (12 to 24 weeks rather than 48 weeks). In addition, the new drugs are administered orally rather than by injections. However, given tight corrections budgets and the high cost of the new HCV medications – Sovaldi costs approximately $1,000 per pill – getting them into prisons and jails ranges from difficult to impossible.

According to the Centers for Disease Control, “The prevalence of HCV infection in prison inmates is substantially higher than that of the general U.S. population. Among prison inmates, 16%-41% have ever been infected with HCV, and 12%-35% are chronically infected, compared to 1%-1.5% in the uninstitutionalized U.S. population.”

Josiah Rich, director of the Center for Prisoner Health and Human Rights at the Miriam Hospital Immunology Center in Rhode Island, noted that “With more than 10 million Americans cycling in and out of prisons and jails each year, including nearly one of every three HCV-infected people, the criminal justice system may be the best place to efficiently identify and cure the greatest number of HCV-infected people.”

Despite the need for improved drugs to treat prisoners with hepatitis C, the cost of the new medications is prohibitive for prisons and jails. Rich estimated that treating all prisoners currently infected with HCV would cost $33 billion.

"I agree with the premise that prisons are an important point to address this problem," said Dr. Joe Goldenson, director of health services for San Francisco's jail system. "But this has to be addressed from an overall strategy of public health and the funding has to come out of that system. Corrections is not a place that can handle these costs."

Since 2011, spending on HCV treatment in correctional settings has climbed rapidly. The increase has been attributed to the introduction of two HCV drugs produced by pharmaceutical companies Merck and Vertex. However, with the recent introduction of the new and more effective treatments, costs are expected to rise again.

The federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP), which houses approximately 216,800 prisoners, may have an easier time affording the drugs. Through a U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs program, the BOP will receive a 44% discount on Olysio and Sovaldi. In February 2014, the federal prison system began making the new HCV medications available to some prisoners.

According to a May 2014 BOP clinical practice guidelines report, titled "Interim Guidance for the Management of Chronic Hepatitis C Infection," the use of sofosbuvir and simeprevir in combination with peginterferon and/or ribavirin is the "preferred treatment regimen." State prisoners, however, may not be as fortunate.

In Washington State, prison officials have established a committee of health-care providers that meets twice a month to review HCV cases for treatment eligibility with the new drugs. In April 2014, Kevin Bovenkamp, the Washington DOC's assistant secretary for health services, said that of ten cases reviewed by the committee, none were approved for treatment.

Dr. Lara Strick, an infectious disease specialist for the Washington DOC, told a reporter from The News Tribune that HCV is a progressive disease and not all prisoners need immediate treatment. She also noted that it might be better for certain patients to wait until newer treatments, with even fewer side effects, are available.

However, it is likely that future HCV treatments that are more effective and have fewer side effects than Olysio and Sovaldi will demand an even higher price, and patients who are currently denied treatment due to fiscal constraints will eventually face the same cost-based roadblocks in the future. On the other hand, additional HCV drugs may lead to greater competition and thus lower prices. Merck, for example, is currently developing a two-drug hepatitis C regimen that reportedly has a 98% cure rate.

Dr. Strick acknowledged that future pricing of new HCV treatments may dictate whether the epidemic of hepatitis C among prisoners can be eradicated as a public health issue.

Since 2010, before Olysio and Sovaldi were available, the cost of HCV treatment for the Washington DOC had more than doubled by 2013 – rising from approximately $834,000 per year to $1.8 million annually. The DOC is trying to determine if a discount from the manufacturers of the new HCV drugs can be negotiated. Gilead has defended its pricing for Sovaldi, citing the drug's potential to prevent longer-term costs resulting from HCV such as liver transplants and treatment for cirrhosis or cancer.

In Illinois, prison officials estimate there are approximately 100 to 150 prisoners afflicted with HCV in each of the state's prisons. They acknowledge that not every HCV-positive prisoner will receive the new drugs; consideration will be given to severity of medical condition, length of sentence and overall health of each prisoner. Still, state corrections officials indicated that even if one-third of the prisoners with HCV receive the new medications, treatment costs would increase to $61 million annually from the current $8 million.

Other states like New York and Wisconsin are dispensing the new HCV drugs on a limited case-by-case basis. A spokesperson for the New York DOC told the Wall Street Journal that nearly 60 prisoners with the most serious cases of HCV had begun treatment with the new drugs. Oregon is reportedly providing the new medications to HCV-positive prisoners with a life expectancy of under one year.

Although prison officials must provide adequate healthcare to prisoners with serious medical needs, as required by the Eighth Amendment pursuant to Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97 (1976), failing to supply the new HCV drugs might not be considered deliberate indifference. Many of the court decisions regarding prison healthcare have required corrections officials to provide adequate treatment that meets minimal constitutional standards – which is not necessarily the best care available. If the new drugs become the community standard of care for hepatitis C, though, the argument can be made that that standard should equally apply to prisoners.

Critics of making the new HCV medications available to prisoners argue the drugs may not be covered under health insurance plans for people who are not incarcerated; thus, prisoners would receive better treatment than those in the general population. Yet this ignores the reality that the less costly and older treatments for HCV currently available to prisoners are routinely denied. [See: PLN, July 2013, p.16; March 2013, p.36].

Prison medical officials can deny HCV treatment for a variety of reasons, including the length of a prisoner's sentence, if they have recently used or been found in possession of illegal drugs or alcohol, or have recently received tattoos. Thus, even should Olysio and Sovaldi become available in prison systems, it is unlikely that many prisoners will actually receive the costly medications.

Gilead has been criticized for pricing Sovaldi based on a scale relative to a country's per-capita income. For example, the drug is offered in Egypt at a 99% discount to the U.S. list price, resulting in treatment costs of approximately $900. Therefore, a U.S. nongovernmental organization based in Egypt could more readily afford to treat Egyptian prisoners using Sovaldi than state prison officials could treat prisoners in the U.S. The company fails to take into account that many of the people infected with HCV in the United States live below the federal poverty level or are incarcerated, on

Janssen Therapeutics spokesman Craig Stoltz said the company continues to "work with public and private payers and health systems" to make simeprevir available to "marginalized and underserved populations," including prisoners.

Eventually, the question of public health ethics must be asked and answered. By not providing the most effective treatment to HCV-positive prisoners, are we endangering the health of the general public? According to a study published in the March-April 2014 issue of Public Health Reports, prisoners represent 28.5-32.8% of the total HCV cases in the United States, based on 2006 data. Prisoners who are untreated, or not effectively treated, are more likely to infect others after they are released.

For Gilead Sciences and Janssen Therapeutics, however, that may be welcome news, because they can then sell their high-priced HCV drugs to even more patients. Until affordable HCV medications are made available to everyone who needs them – including prisoners – the hepatitis C epidemic might be slowed but will not be stopped. ■

Eighth Circuit: No Qualified Immunity for Detainee's Overdose Death

by Mark Wilson

THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS held on September 20, 2013 that an Arkansas jail guard was not entitled to qualified immunity for his deliberate indifference to a detainee's serious medical condition which resulted in the detainee's death.

On December 18, 2008, Saline County deputy sheriff Stephen Furr arrested Johnny Dale Thompson, Jr. During the arrest, Deputy Furr discovered an empty Xanax bottle that indicated it had been filled with 60 pills two days earlier. Thompson, who was slurring his words, admitted to taking medication and slept in the patrol car, but was easily awakened at the jail.

Jail guard Ulenzen C. King conducted Thompson's booking process. King noted that Thompson appeared intoxicated; he asked to sit down but nearly fell out of the chair. He was unable to sign his name and "couldn't even answer questions that Officer King was asking him." King wrote "Too Intox to Sign" on the booking sheet.

Sometime after Thompson was placed in a cell at 7:42 p.m., another detainee alerted King that Thompson needed help, but King did nothing.

At 9:09 p.m., King and another jailer entered Thompson's cell and discovered he was "cool to the touch, not breathing, and non-responsive." He was pronounced dead at a hospital around 20 minutes later.

An autopsy revealed that Thompson had ingested a cocktail of drugs, including hydrocodone, methadone and alprazolam. The medical examiner classified his death as accidental.

Thompson's mother filed suit in federal court against Saline County and several individual defendants. The district court granted qualified immunity to all the defendants except Furr and King; both then filed an interlocutory appeal.

The Eighth Circuit observed that its review was limited to determining whether Furr and King knew that Thompson had a serious medical need but deliberately disregarded that need.

The appellate court followed Grayson v.

Ross, 454 F.3d 802 (8th Cir. 2006) in holding that Furr lacked subjective knowledge that Thompson required medical attention. As such, it concluded that Furr was not deliberately indifferent to Thompson's medical needs and was entitled to qualified immunity.

The Court of Appeals found, however, that "Ross does not compel the same conclusion for Officer King." Rather, Thompson "presented a noticeably more intoxicated condition during his encounter with Officer King than the detainee in Ross."

Given the information available to King when Thompson was booked into the jail, the Eighth Circuit affirmed the district court's denial of qualified immunity, holding that "a reasonable jury could find that ... King had subjective knowledge of a serious medical need and deliberately disregarded that need." See: Thompson v. King, 730 F.3d 742 (8th Cir. 2013).

Following remand, the case went to trial in January 2014 and the federal jury found in favor of King, resulting in no recovery for Thompson's estate. ■

Ninth Circuit: Damages Required for Compelled Religious-Based Treatment

by Mark Wilson

THE NINTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS has held that damages are required, as a matter of law, when a parolee is incarcerated for objecting to compelled participation in a religious-based drug treatment program.

Citing “uncommonly well-settled case law,” the Court of Appeals found in 2007 that the First Amendment is violated when the state coerces an individual to attend a religious-based substance abuse program. See: Inouye v. Kemna, 504 F.3d 705 (9th Cir. 2007).

The California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) contracts with Westcare, a private entity, to provide drug and alcohol treatment for parolees in Northern California. Westcare, in turn, contracts with Empire Recovery Center, a non-profit facility. “Empire uses a 12-step recovery program, developed by Alcoholics Anonymous and Narcotics Anonymous, that includes references to ‘God’ and to ‘higher power.’”

Barry A. Hazle, Jr., an atheist, was incarcerated due to California drug convictions. His parole conditions required him to complete a 90-day residential drug treatment program.

Prior to his February 26, 2007 release from prison, Hazle had asked prison and Westcare officials to place him in a non-religious treatment program. Westcare officials directed Hazle to Empire.

When Hazle realized Empire was a religious-based program, he repeatedly objected to Westcare officials. They responded “that the only alternative to Empire was a treatment facility whose program had an even greater focus on religion.”

Hazle asked parole agent Mitch Crofoot for a transfer to a secular treatment program, and was ordered to remain at Empire while Crofoot looked into the issue.

Westcare claimed that it had no secular programs; Crofoot then informed Hazle that no alternative programs were available and he needed to complete the Empire program or his parole would be revoked and he would return to prison.

On April 6, 2007, Empire informed Crofoot that Hazle was being “disruptive, though in a congenial way,” and that his demeanor was “sort of passive aggressive.” Crofoot and parole supervisor Brenda Wilding were aware of Hazle’s religious objections, but recommended revocation of his parole for refusing to participate in the treatment program. Hazle’s parole was revoked and he was returned to prison for 100 days.

Hazle then sued Westcare and several state officials, alleging they had violated his First Amendment rights by requiring his participation in a 12-step program as a condition of parole, rejecting his requests for a secular program and revoking his parole for refusing to participate in the 12-step program. He sought compensatory damages – for loss of liberty and emotional distress – as well as punitive damages and injunctive relief.

After Hazle filed suit, the CDCR issued a directive in response to Inouye, stating that parolees who refuse to participate in religious-based programs may not be compelled to attend such programs and must “be referred to an alternative non-religious program.”

The district court entered summary judgment against the defendant state officials, finding them liable for violating Hazle’s First Amendment rights. The court granted summary judgment to Westcare, however, holding that “Hazle had not established the necessary causal connection between Westcare’s actions and the

A trial was then held to determine damages. The district court informed the jury it had previously found “that each defendant violated plaintiff’s First Amendment Establishment Clause right by ... arresting and incarcerating plaintiff because of [his] failure to participate in the program.”

At the request of the defendants, however, the court instructed the jury to decide if they were jointly and severally liable or whether damages should be apportioned among them. In the latter case, the jury was to apportion damages.

The jury returned a damages verdict finding the defendants were not jointly and severally liable, and awarded Hazle no damages against each defendant.

Hazle moved for a new trial under FRCP 59(a), arguing that the zero damages verdict was contrary to the law and evidence. The district court denied the motion, holding that Hazle had waived his objection by failing to raise it before the jury was discharged, and that the jury’s finding that damages could be apportioned among the defendants was consistent with its finding that none of the defendants had caused Hazle’s constitutional injuries.

The Ninth Circuit reversed, holding that Hazle did not waive his objection and the district court had improperly denied his motion for a new trial.

Hazle no compensatory damages at all for his loss of liberty, cannot be upheld,” the Court of Appeals concluded. “Given the indisputable fact of actual injury resulting from Hazle’s unconstitutional imprisonment, and the district judge’s finding that the state defendants were liable for that injury,” the Court held that “an award of compensatory damages was mandatory. The jury simply was not entitled to refuse to award any damages for Hazle’s undisputable – and undisputed – loss of liberty, and its verdict to the contrary must be rejected.”

The district court had also “erred in putting the question of apportionment to the jury in the first place,” the Ninth Circuit wrote. That “is a legal [issue] to be decided by the judge, not the jury.” The jury’s resolution of that issue was “simply inconsistent with the district judge’s order holding defendants liable for Hazle’s false imprisonment.”

In addition, the appellate court reversed the district court’s grant of summary judgment in favor of Westcare, finding “a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Westcare’s policy of contracting solely with religious facilities was a proximate cause of [Hazle’s] constitutional injuries.” The Ninth Circuit noted that “Inouye leaves little room for Westcare to argue that constitutional injuries of the sort suffered by Hazle were not a foreseeable result of its actions.”

Lastly, the Court of Appeals reversed the dismissal of Hazle’s state law claim for injunctive relief to enjoin the CDCR from “carrying on any unlawful actions.” The Court said the facts in this case established “that, notwithstanding the state’s directive [to provide alternative nonreligious programs], the defendants do not appear to have taken any concrete steps to prevent other parolees from suffering the same constitutional violations Hazle suffered.”

The case was reversed and remanded, and remains pending on remand. See: Hazle v. Crofoot, 727 F.3d 983 (9th Cir. 2013). ■

Louisiana Public Service Commission Considers Prison Phone Issues

THE ADVOCATE REPORTED IN MARCH 2014 that tensions were high between Louisiana Public Service Commission (PSC) Chairman Eric Skrmetta and PSC Commissioner Foster Campbell during a hearing on issues related to prison and jail phone rates.

Previously, in December 2012, the PSC voted to lower the cost of phone calls made by Louisiana prisoners by cutting the rates of some calls by 25% and prohibiting surcharges. The ban on surcharges went into effect on February 28, 2013, while the rate reduction – which only applies to calls made to family members, clergy, attorneys and certain other parties – was postponed until 2014. [See: PLN, April 2013, p.29; Jan. 2013, p.14; Feb. 2012, p.36].

Two prison phone service providers, City Tele-Coin and Securus Technologies (which also has the phone contract for Louisiana's state prison system), were subsequently cited by the PSC for contempt for charging additional fees in spite of the prohibition on surcharges.

Commissioner Campbell had championed the prison phone reforms, including the 25% rate reduction. City Tele-Coin and Securus have since petitioned the PSC to rescind the rate cut and ban on surcharges.

Additionally, City Tele-Coin hosted a fundraiser for PSC Chairman Skrmetta's election campaign, and the company's owner, Jerry Juneau, and his wife donated $10,000 to Skrmetta's campaign fund in December 2013.

Although the contempt citations against Securus and City Tele-Coin were pending before administrative law judges, Chairman Skrmetta asked the PSC to settle the cases.

The City Tele-Coin surcharges at issue include an "administrative cost" of up to $10 when opening a direct-pay account; a "processing cost" on direct-pay refunds of $5; a "transfer fee" of up to $2.50 to move balances on direct-pay accounts to a different phone number; and a monthly "inactivity fee" of up to $10 for accounts with no activity in a six-month period.

Securus charges a "processing fee" of $6.95 for credit card and check-by-phone payments; a "wireless administrative fee" of up to $2.99 a month when a user lists a wireless number authorized to receive prison phone calls; and a "processing fee" of $4.95 on refunds from unused accounts.

On April 2, 2014, the PSC held a hearing to address issues related to the contempt citations. Commissioner Campbell had asked the PSC to hire a technical consultant to audit the books of the two prison phone companies, but the Commission rejected his request. Chairman Skrmetta sought to go into a behind-closed-doors executive session to settle the citations against Securus and City Tele-Coin, which also was rejected by the full Commission; consequently, the administrative law process will continue and the verdicts will be reviewed by the PSC. A number of prison phone justice advocates and community faith leaders testified at the hearing as to how the surcharges and high phone rates hurt prisoners' families and the local community.

Another PSC hearing, held in May 2014, was attended by Caddo Parish Sheriff Steve Prator, who criticized the Commission's actions to reduce prison and jail phone rates, saying they compromised security at his jail.

"I'm not getting in your business about what the phone rates are. That's not what I'm here to tell you. I'm just going to emphasize they've got to be monitored and we've got to have the technology, and it's expensive to do. Government has to pay for it. We have to pay for it," Prator said.

The rate reductions also have been criticized by an organization called "Crimefighters," founded by a retired New Orleans police officer, which took out a full-page ad in the Shreveport Times accusing Commissioner Campbell of "fighting for the rights of criminals" and "being soft on crime."

Similarly, Keith Gates, an attorney who is challenging Campbell's seat on the PSC in elections this fall, accused him of helping "jailbirds."

On June 6, 2014, in a monthly news column, Commissioner Campbell noted that high prison phone rates have troubled him for more than a decade. "This issue involves millions of dollars collected by monopoly telephone companies, the correctional facilities they do business with, and the families of 40,000 people in jail in Louisiana," he said.

"The Public Service Commission must assure that monopoly utility companies don't abuse their customers," Campbell added. "Inmate families have few advocates to defend them against corporations charging outrageous phone rates and questionable fees."

PLN will report future developments concerning prison phone rates in Louisiana. If City Tele-Coin and Securus are found guilty of the contempt citations, they face thousands of dollars in fines and the potential loss of their licenses to operate in the state. ■

State of Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign

Prison Phone Justice Project needs your help for statewide campaign!

While much progress has been made in reducing the costs of long distance prison calls, we are still fighting to reduce the high costs of in-state prison and jail calls at the local level. In January 2014, the Human Rights Defense Center (HRDC), the parent organization of Prison Legal News, reopened its Seattle office to launch the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign.

This is our first statewide phone justice campaign, and we're excited to have people involved on both the local and national levels who are dedicated to ending the exorbitant phone rates and kickbacks associated with the prison phone industry. We have already been obtaining the phone rates and contracts from all 39 county jails in the state and the Washington DOC.

We hired a local campaign director, Carrie Wilkinson, who manages our office in Seattle and is coordinating the statewide campaign. Washington prisoners and their families pay some of the highest phone rates in the nation, and we need your help to win this battle!

Here's how you can help – first, please visit the campaign website:

www.wappj.org

There you can see all the ways you can make a difference. The site allows you to sign up for the campaign and upload videos and share blog entries about how high prison phone rates make it difficult for you to stay in touch with your incarcerated loved ones. You can even call in your story to 1-877-410-4863, toll-free, at any time! We need to hear how you and your family have been affected by high prison and jail phone rates. If you don't have Internet access, you can mail us a letter describing your experiences. Send letters to HRDC's main office at: HRDC, Attn: WA Phone Justice Campaign, P.O. Box 1151, Lake Worth, FL 33460. Washington state prisoners can send a copy of this notice to their family members so they can get involved.

We especially need copies of telephone bills that show prison and jail phone charges!

By choosing to participate in the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign, you will be playing a key role in ending the unfair phone rates that prisoners' families have to pay. We cannot win this battle without your help, so please visit the campaign website and share your experiences! Donations are also welcome and greatly appreciated, and can be mailed to the above address or made online via the campaign website. Thank you for your support!

Two Murders in Seven Months at CCA-run Prison in Tennessee

ON MAY 23, 2014, THE MEDICAL Examiner's Office in Nashville completed an autopsy report on Tennessee state prisoner Jeffery Sills, 43, who was murdered at the South Central Correctional Facility in Clifton, Wayne County on March 28. The facility is operated by Corrections Corporation of America (CCA), the nation's largest for-profit prison company.

Sills' death was classified as a homicide caused by "blunt and sharp force injuries." He was allegedly beaten and stabbed to death by his cellmate, Travis Bess, who was later transferred to the Riverbend Maximum Security Institution.

Jeffery Sills was at least the second prisoner murdered at the CCA-run prison since September 1, 2013, when Gerald Ewing, 28, was killed during a series of fights at the facility. Comparably, according to the Tennessee Department of Correction there were no homicides at state-run prisons in calendar year 2013 and to date this year.

Jeffery Sills' death was particularly brutal, according to the autopsy report. He suffered lacerations, abrasions and contusions to his head and neck, fractured cheek and nasal bones, cutting and stab/puncture wounds, and hemorrhages in the "posterior cervical spinal muscles" and "skeletal muscle of back and intercostal muscles of posterior thorax."

Prison Legal News managing editor Alex Friedmann, who also serves as associate director of PLN's parent organization, the Human Rights Defense Center (HRDC), said both prisoners and a CCA staff member employed at South Central contacted HRDC after Sills was murdered.

"Several prisoners said Bess had publicly stated he would kill Jeffrey Sills if they were placed in a cell together, and that CCA guards were present when he made that statement. Regardless, they were both put in the same cell with predictable results." Additionally, "the CCA employee who contacted us reported that Sills had asked to be placed in protective custody, but prison staff failed to act on his request before he was murdered," said Friedmann, who served six years at South Central himself prior to his release in 1999.

The Tennessee Bureau of Investigation is investigating Sills' death and has reportedly indicated that an indictment will issue soon.

"Two murders within seven months is extremely disturbing," Friedmann stated, "especially considering that CCA houses about 5,000 [Tennessee] state prisoners in three facilities while around 15,000 prisoners are held in 11 state-run facilities. Yet despite holding one-third as many prisoners, none of whom are classified maximum-security, two murders occurred at a CCA facility and zero in state prisons within the same time period."

According to research conducted by HRDC, historically there have been higher rates of violence at the three CCA-operated facilities in Tennessee than in state prisons. Based on the most recent data provided by the Department of Correction, during the first five months of 2013 the average rate of violent incidents at the CCA-run prisons – including prisoner-on-prisoner assaults, prisoner-on-staff assaults and institutional disturbances – was 24.6% higher than at state facilities.

"Other studies have also found higher levels of violence at privately-managed prisons," said Friedmann. "This is presumably due to the business model of the private prison industry, which must cut costs in order to generate profit. Those cuts, particularly in regard to staffing costs, lead to high staff turnover rates, understaffing and thus less security at private prisons. Consequently there are higher rates of violence – up to and including murder, evidently."

The FBI is currently investigating fraudulent staffing reports at a CCA prison in Idaho. [See: PLN, Oct. 15, 2013, p.28; May 2013, p.22].

There have been two other recent homicides at CCA-operated prisons in other states, including the November 2013 murder of Michael Patrick McNaughton, 55, who was beaten to death at a CCA facility in Florence, Arizona, and the March 2014 murder of California prisoner Todd Bush, 33, at the CCA-run North Fork Correctional Facility in Oklahoma. ■

Visitors Fingerprinted at Alabama Prisons

ALABAMA'S PRISON SYSTEM IS THE FIRST – and currently only – in the nation to require visitors to be fingerprinted. In late 2012, the Alabama Department of Corrections (ADOC) implemented the new policy due to what officials claimed was a need for greater efficiency. A new computer system had the capacity to scan fingerprints, something the old system was not able to do. The fingerprinting procedure was "part of the upgrade" and the brainchild of the ADOC's IT department, according to prison system spokesman Brian Corbett.

The old system required guards to review each visitor's driver's license to verify their identity before allowing them into a state prison.

"That was a time-consuming task," Corbett told the Montgomery Advertiser. "Now, the verification process is much faster, so visitors are moved through the process much faster."

"We still require visitors to have a government-issued photo ID, and that requirement will remain in place," he added. "But there are times when someone else resembles the photo on an ID. Scanning the fingerprint of visitors verifies they are who they say they are."

The program prompted an immediate response from the American Civil Liberties Union. David Fathi, director of the ACLU's National Prison Project, didn't buy the ADOC's purported security concerns.

"Alabama prison officials can't say with a straight face that it is a security issue, not when the remaining 49 state prison systems do not require the scanning of visitors' fingerprints," he stated. "It is an unnecessary barrier to visiting inmates."

Fathi called the fingerprint scan "extreme" – especially since visitors to Alabama state prisons already have to undergo a criminal background check.

"If showing a driver's license is all that is required to get on an airplane that will fly you near the White House," he said, "it should be enough to get you inside a prison

ADOC officials claimed that visitors' fingerprints will not be shared with local, state or other law enforcement agencies, nor will they be used to check for outstanding warrants. Alabama is the first state to require visitor fingerprinting at all state prisons, but other correctional facilities have considered similar policies.

In the nation's capital, officials with the District of Columbia Department of Corrections (DC DOC) announced in early 2011 that they were considering fingerprinting visitors at the D.C. jail to check for outstanding warrants.

The proposal prompted concerns that the fingerprinting would be overly intrusive, even though DC DOC officials said they never intended to digitally store the fingerprints and the Metropolitan police would decide what to do if a visitor's fingerprints revealed an outstanding warrant.

Corrections officials told the Washington Examiner that they wanted to use “live scan” technology to take an image of the visitors’ fingerprints – the same technology used on prisoners to confirm their identity when they enter and leave the jail. The District planned to use federal grant money to pay for the system.

“Through a $134,000 grant from the Office of Justice Grants, we will be [using] the technology in our visitors control area to assist [D.C. police] in the identification of individuals with outstanding warrants,” corrections spokeswoman Sylvia Lane told the Examiner. “If a match is made, DOC will detain the visitor and contact the police department and the visitor will be taken into custody,” she said.

The DC DOC's plan to fingerprint visitors faced sharp criticism, however, and officials announced in March 2011 that they were reevaluating the proposal due to a "host of legal, financial and operational concerns that have been raised."

In Maryland, a public protest accompanied the March 2013 implementation of a policy requiring all visitors to the Baltimore City Detention Center to be fingerprinted. The warden at the jail said if the fingerprinting reveals that a visitor has been incarcerated, then he or she will not be allowed to visit.

Prison Industries in India Compete in Open Market

THE GOVERNMENT OF THE INDIAN STATE of Tamil Nadu is expanding a program that allows prison industries to compete in the open marketplace under the ironic brand name "Freedom." Prison industry programs already exist at nine central prisons, three women's prisons and nine district jails scattered across Tamil Nadu, located in the southern tip of the Asian nation. The facilities hold a combined total of about 11,000 prisoners.

Prison authorities are adding open-air bazaars to market fresh produce grown by prisoners to shoppers from neighboring communities. The bazaars are in addition to current prison industries that include the production of soap, leather, textiles, books and baked goods. Traditionally, those products have been sold only to other government agencies and are considered substandard.

"So far, we were manufacturing goods for the police and other departments. Such government clients are not very demanding in terms of pricing, delivery schedule and quality, although we ourselves try to maintain this," said S.K. Dogra, Additional Director-General of Police in Tamil Nadu. "But once you operate in the open market, you have to adopt the best commercial practices. So, naturally the entire process of manufacturing will have to move up the scale in terms of efficiency and quality."

Providing prisoners with skills they can use to obtain jobs after their release is a major objective of the program. Prison officials said they have identified individuals who are qualified to provide training to prisoners in the use of modern manufacturing technology. Additionally, a portion of the revenue generated by the sale of prison-made goods on the open market is earmarked for prisoners' accounts.

The expansion of the "Freedom" label includes a jail in Ondipudur, in the western part of the state, where prisoners have taken to farming. Under the watchful eye of guards, they sell their produce in a newly-created bazaar on the facility grounds.

P. Govindarajan, Deputy Inspector General of Prisons in nearby Coimbatore, said the bazaar is an effort to both rehabilitate and re-socialize prisoners. One of the prisoners at the facility said the program has allowed him to pursue his goal of becoming a farmer. "Life took me elsewhere, but I am finally living my childhood dream," said "Madhu," a prisoner whose real name was not disclosed, in February 2014.

Another prisoner said the program gave him a sense of fulfillment. "It was a very proud moment to see something I'd planted give fruit," he said, holding an ear of corn he had grown.

Prison officials said the profits from the bazaar are shared among prisoners, prison staff and the Tamil Nadu government, with each receiving 20% of the net proceeds. The remaining 40% is placed in a state prison fund.

On February 23, 2014, Chief Minister J. Jayalalithaa inaugurated a "Freedom Shop" in the Puzhal prison complex in eastern India, to serve as a market for prisoner-produced goods; the shop includes a bakery, a waiting hall for visitors and other facilities.

A press release said the Chief Minister directed that "Freedom Shops" be opened in all central Indian prisons to market goods made by prisoners. The initiative is part of the state's effort to reform prisoners and provide them with training to help them live a decent life after they complete their sentences.

Products for sale include garments, bakery items, footwear, soaps, candles, mosquito nets, rain coats and more, all manufactured by prisoners. In addition, the program is providing agricultural training to prisoners at two other facilities in Singanailur and Salem.

"I do not see any difficulty in marketing the products," said Dogra. "Many of the prison inmates are highly skilled. Since they do not have any diversions within the prison, they usually work with greater focus."

Taken from a different perspective, however, Dogra's comments could portend abuse of the system. Because prisoners "do not have any diversions," which makes them good workers, prison authorities may have an incentive to prevent the introduction of any "diversions"—such as educational, treatment or other rehabilitative programs—to ensure that prisoners focus on their profit-generating prison industry jobs. ■

Jury's Tasteless Gag Gifts to Judge and Bailiff Fail to Demonstrate Unfair Trial

THE ELEVENTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS has affirmed the denial of a death row prisoner's habeas corpus petition that contended he was denied a fair trial by an impartial judge and jury because the jurors gave inappropriate gag gifts to the judge and one of the bailiffs.

The habeas proceeding involved Georgia death row prisoner Marcus A. Wellons, who was convicted of the murder and rape of a fourteen-year-old girl in 1989. During his trial, Wellons did not dispute that he had killed and raped the victim; rather, he claimed he was either not guilty by reason of insanity or guilty but mentally ill. After finding him guilty, the jury recommended a sentence of death for the murder and life for the rape.

Defense counsel learned during post-trial interviews that some jurors gave gag gifts to the judge and a bailiff either near the end of or immediately following the penalty phase of the trial. The judge received chocolate candy in the shape of a penis while the bailiff received chocolate in the shape of female breasts. Wellons' counsel also learned that when the sequestered jurors dined at a local restaurant, the judge had spoken to them.

Motions for a new trial and for recusal of the judge were denied, Wellons' convictions were affirmed on appeal and the Supreme Court denied review. Likewise, a state habeas petition was denied. After the federal district court denied Wellons' habeas petition, the Eleventh Circuit affirmed. This time, however, the Supreme Court granted certiorari and the matter was subsequently remanded for an evidentiary hearing on the "disturbing facts of this case." The district court again denied relief and Wellons again appealed.

As for the encounter at the restaurant, most of the jurors testified that the judge had waved or nodded or made a brief comment. One juror recalled the encounter occurred on the day the jury saw the autopsy photos, and the judge commented that she understood the jurors were upset.

Four of the jurors said they did not become aware of the gag gift to the judge until later. As it turned out, a friend of one of the jurors owned a confectionery shop, and the juror asked her husband to ask the friend to make chocolate turtles for the jury. The friend, who was unaware of the serious nature of the case, included the gag gifts to "lighten things up." On the last day of the trial, the gifts were given to the judge and bailiff.

The Eleventh Circuit cited precedent holding that an ex parte communication alone is insufficient to overturn a conviction. Additionally, the record did not indicate the trial judge had showed partiality during the brief encounter with the jurors at the restaurant, so habeas relief on that issue was properly denied.

Further, the Court of Appeals found the gag gifts did not call into question the impartiality of the jury. It held the "unfortunate giving of these tasteless gifts" was "inconsequential to the verdict" and played no role in the judge's or jury's consideration of the case. The jurors testified that the gifts, which were given at the conclusion of the case, had nothing to do with anything that occurred during the trial.

The appellate court noted judges or bailiffs should not receive gifts from the jury. "Trial judges are expected to handle these situations, sternly admonish or discipline those involved, and disclose such occurrences to each party so that timely objections can be considered and made," wrote the Eleventh Circuit. While the judge had failed to do so in this case, the Court of Appeals found the jurors' testimony did not indicate Wellons had received an unfair trial.

"We also acknowledge that the ill-advised actions of a few thoughtless jurors could create the perception that this jury was too busy joking around rather than deciding Wellons's fate," the appellate court stated. "But these were two isolated incidents in the span of a multi-week trial and we cannot say, on the basis of this record, that the verdicts were tainted."

Accordingly, the district court's denial of Wellons' habeas petition was affirmed.

A petition for writ of certiorari, filed with the U.S. Supreme Court, was denied on October 7, 2013. Wellons remains on Georgia's death row. See: Wellons v. Warden, Georgia Diagnostic and Classification Prison, 695 F.3d 1202 (11th Cir. 2012), cert. denied. ■

Decline in Arrests of Los Angeles County Probation Officers

THE LOS ANGELES COUNTY PROBATION Office has cited tougher self-policing and stricter hiring standards for a dramatic decrease in the number of employees arrested for driving under the influence and various other crimes, but the union representing probation officers complained the changes have led to understaffing.

Probation Office Chief Jerry Powers said the number of probation employees arrested for crimes both on and off the job fell from a high of 74 in 2011 to just 32 in 2013. Nearly half the arrests last year – 15 – were for DUI offenses. Most of the remaining charges were theft and assault.

“We’ve come light years from where we were to where we are today,” Powers said at a news conference.

But the president of AFSCME Local 685, the union representing the county’s probation officers, disputed Powers’ claim that the drop in the number of arrests was the result of hiring standards and self-policing.

“It’s like crime statistics, they go up and down all the time,” union president Ralph Miller said. “Taking credit for those numbers going down is like taking credit for the sun rising and setting.”

Powers said stricter hiring standards, including polygraph tests and more extensive background checks of job applicants, were responsible for the decline. The Probation Office has also become more aggressive with internal investigations.

“The amount of discipline has almost tripled, so we’re holding employees accountable,” Powers stated. “I think that sends a message to all employees in the department that you’re going to behave, on duty and off duty, and if you fail to meet our standards, we’re prepared to see that you correct your behavior or you find another employer.”

The Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors heaped praise on the Probation Office in late 2013 for implementing the new standards, but the union said the changes jeopardized public safety. By January 2014, the union noted, more than 1,000 of the Probation Office’s 6,600 job positions remained vacant, while probation officers were required to monitor some 80,000 adult and juvenile offenders – a number that has increased under California’s Realignment initiative. [See: PLN, June 2014, p.1].

AFSCME Local 685 complained that the new hiring standards are not realistic, and in a letter to the Board of Supervisors accused Powers of having “seriously mismanaged the hiring and promotional process, resulting in a grave public safety crisis.”

Arrests of probation officers fell from 74 in 2011 to 44 in 2012, but included some high-profile cases, including one high-ranking employee who was charged with defrauding banks by falsely claiming his identity had been stolen.

On September 17, 2012, FBI agents arrested Carl Edward Washington, a division chief of intergovernmental relations. In announcing the arrest, the FBI said Washington faced “three counts of bank fraud and three counts of making a false statement to a federally insured financial institution.”

Washington is also an ordained minister and a former lawmaker who was elected three times to the state Assembly. As a Probation Office employee, he reportedly received loans and credit cards to purchase airline tickets and hotel rooms and to obtain cash advances totaling “several thousand dollars,” according to investigators.

Washington eventually stopped paying his debts and claimed to be a victim of identity theft. On July 22, 2013, he was sentenced to one day in federal prison with credit for one day already served, plus three years of supervised release and $193,898.25 in restitution.

Of the 44 Los Angeles County probation officers arrested in 2012, dozens were charged with drunk driving, drug possession and theft. Charges were also filed against a six-year veteran employee for filing false workers’ compensation claims, and against a probation officer for allegedly shooting a man in a bar.

“They shouldn’t have 40 arrests in any department,” said Connie Rice, a civil rights attorney and police watchdog who has been critical of the Probation Office. “If you have 40 arrests, that ought to be a sign that something is very wrong. It’s like, ‘Houston, we have a problem.’”

The number of probation employees charged with crimes fell again to 32 in 2013.

“We don’t want any arrests, but reducing the numbers by half in two years shows our new policies are having an impact,” said Assistant Chief Probation Officer Don Meyer. “If we could reduce it to zero – which is unrealistic – that would be nice, but we’ve obviously done a good job. It’s not by accident that those numbers have gone down.”

Still, some high-profile arrests have continued. In August 2013, probation officer Frank Elliott Boyd III, 48, pleaded not guilty to charges arising from a scheme to defraud the state of $1.6 million in phony childcare payments.

According to prosecutors, Boyd, his ex-girlfriend and four other co-defendants allegedly set up a number of licensed home-based childcare centers, then urged parents to file fake documents with county and state agencies for childcare that was never provided. Boyd was charged with conspiracy, grand theft and perjury.

Also in 2013, a former probation officer was arrested on misdemeanor charges of using his iPad to take photos up a woman’s skirt. Julio Mario Medal was sentenced to five years’ probation and ordered to perform 120 days of community service after pleading guilty to secretly videotaping for sexual gratification, unlawful loitering and attempted videotaping for sexual gratification.

Arrests have continued into 2014. For example, former Los Angeles County probation officer Robyn Palmer, 29, was arrested on felony charges of insurance fraud, forgery, grand theft and wire fraud on May 16, 2014. She had received over $29,000 in workers’ comp payments for an injury allegedly received while restraining a juvenile offender. However, it was later learned she was not at work on the day she claimed the injury occurred. Palmer was jailed on $100,000 bond.

Meyer noted that most of the Probation Office employees who have been arrested were hired in 2005-2008, when the office did not conduct background checks on job applicants. ■

States Renewing Their Prison Phone Contracts

As state DOCs renew or rebid their prison phone contracts, you can help urge them to lower intrastate phone rates and eliminate commission kickbacks!

The Campaign for Prison Phone Justice needs your help in:

**** Utah, Arkansas and Nevada ******

The Departments of Corrections in the above states are in the process of re-bidding or renewing their prison phone contracts. Most DOCs receive a commission (kickback) on revenue generated from calls made by prisoners, which results in excessively high phone rates. Although the FCC voted last year to cap the costs of interstate (long distance) prison calls, which went into effect on February 11, 2014, the order does not apply to intrastate (in-state) calls. An estimated 85% of prison phone calls are in-state. This is an opportunity to ask DOCs to forgo commissions and ensure their new prison phone contracts are based on the lowest cost to those who pay for the calls – mostly prisoners' families.

Take Action NOW! Here's What YOU Can Do!

Ask your family members and friends to write, email, call and fax the DOC and the governor's office (addresses and contacts are listed below), requesting that the DOC: 1) forgo commission payments when re-bidding or renewing its prison phone contract, and 2) base the new contract on the lowest calling costs. Lower prison phone rates should apply not just to long distance calls but also to in-state calls. For a sample letter or to easily send an email, visit the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice's website and click on the "Take Action" tab:

Kentucky Prisoner's Due Process Rights Violated in Disciplinary Hearing

by Robert Warlick

ON AUGUST 29, 2013, THE KENTUCKY Supreme Court affirmed an appellate decision that found an Adjustment Committee (AC) in a prison disciplinary proceeding had violated a prisoner's due process rights by not meeting the "some evidence" standard as applied to confidential informants (CIs).

Ontario Thomas, imprisoned at the Northpoint Training Center in Kentucky, was found guilty by the AC in June 2009 of assaulting another prisoner, based solely on statements from at least two CIs.

On December 16, 2009, Thomas filed a petition in the Lyon Circuit Court alleging that the AC's reliance on the CI information violated his due process rights. However, before the court ruled on his petition, two AC reviews were conducted which determined that the CI statements were reliable, reaffirming the guilty finding. The AC stated it had "review[ed] the confidential information and believe it to be true and reliable according to policy." The Circuit Court subsequently dismissed Thomas' petition, finding that his rights had not been violated.

The Court of Appeals reversed due to the AC's failure to meet the "some evidence" standard during Thomas' disciplinary hearing. The appellate court relied primarily on Hesley v. Wilson, 850 F.2d 269 (6th Cir. 1988), which requires a court to assess the reliability of a CI and the CI's information to determine whether it qualifies as "some evidence." The record on appeal provided no details as to the credibility of the CIs; consequently, the Court of Appeals held that Thomas' due process rights were violated and remanded the case for a new AC hearing.

The state appealed and the Kentucky Supreme Court affirmed. Citing supporting federal cases from the Third, Seventh, Eighth and Ninth Circuits, the Court noted that the record "simply begs for some corroborating factors" of the CIs' reliability, which could be done by stating for the record, "without divulging identities, why witnesses are reliable."

The state Supreme Court concluded that "there is plainly no evidence to support the Adjustment Committee's determination that the informants' information was reliable. We know nothing of these informants and their information – whether they were eyewitnesses or whether there was any corroborating evidence. It would be helpful if the investigating officer, after being duly sworn, gave written details of what was related. This would not only bolster the observation of the witnesses, but would also provide the inmate charged with a better opportunity to rebut the evidence against him." See: Haney v. Thomas, 406 S.W.3d 823 (Ky. 2013). ■

Brady Violations Result in Habeas Relief for Pennsylvania Death Row Prisoner

by David Reutter

TO CORRECT A "GRAVE MISCARRIAGE of justice," Pennsylvania U.S. District Court Judge Anita Brody granted a writ of habeas corpus to a state prisoner and vacated his conviction and death sentence for a murder that "in all probability he did not commit." The court found violations under Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963) due to the state's withholding of evidence.

James A. Dennis was convicted in Philadelphia for the October 22, 1991 killing of high school student Chedell Williams. Williams, 17, and a friend, Zahra Howard, were approached by two men who demanded they give up their earrings. The girls fled; Howard hid behind a fruit stand while Williams ran into the street.

The men chased Williams. One of them held a gun to her neck and shot her; they then jumped into a car and sped away.

Williams was pronounced dead shortly after her arrival at a hospital.

Dennis' conviction was "based on scant evidence at best," the district court wrote in an August 21, 2013 ruling. "It was based solely on shaky eyewitness identifications from three witnesses, the testimony of another man who said he saw Dennis with a gun the night of the murder, and a description of clothing seized from the house of Dennis' father that the police subsequently lost before police photographed or catalogued it."

The police never recovered a weapon, never found the car used by the assailants and never found two accomplices described by witnesses. Judge Brody said confidence in Dennis' conviction was significantly diminished by flaws with the investigation and prosecution of the case, and noted "There was virtually no physical evidence presented at trial."

All five of the nine witnesses who provided estimates of the shooter's height put him at 5'7" to 5'10", with four describing him as 5'9" or 5'10". Dennis, however, is only 5'5". None of the witnesses confidently identified Dennis right away, but three ultimately became the only testifying witnesses for the state. The other witnesses did not testify – a fact the district court found to be a troubling flaw in trial counsel's investigation and trial preparation.

Of the witnesses not called to testify, four did not identify Dennis as the shooter, three did not pick him from a photo array and another chose a different suspect from a line-up. A witness who had looked the shooter in the eye definitively said Dennis was not the shooter, but the state never informed defense counsel of that fact.

Upon considering Dennis' habeas petition, the federal district court found several Brady violations. First, it found violations in the suppression of six documents. The state did not dispute that it failed to disclose the documents to Dennis until a decade after his trial.

One of those documents was a statement from a jail prisoner who had corroborated evidence in the case and pointed to two other suspects. Another involved a witness who saw Dennis on the day of the murder; she gave police an original receipt from the Department of Public Welfare that would have corroborated Dennis' alibi that she had seen him on a bus at the time of the murder.

The prosecution also suppressed statements from Zahra Howard's aunt and uncle, who said she had recognized the shooter from her high school and two people she knew were present during the shooting.

As for the witness who said he had seen Dennis with a gun on the day Williams was killed, he only made that statement after being arrested "for a violent assault of his pregnant girlfriend that left her in the hospital," and six months later prosecutors dropped the felony assault charges against him "without explanation."

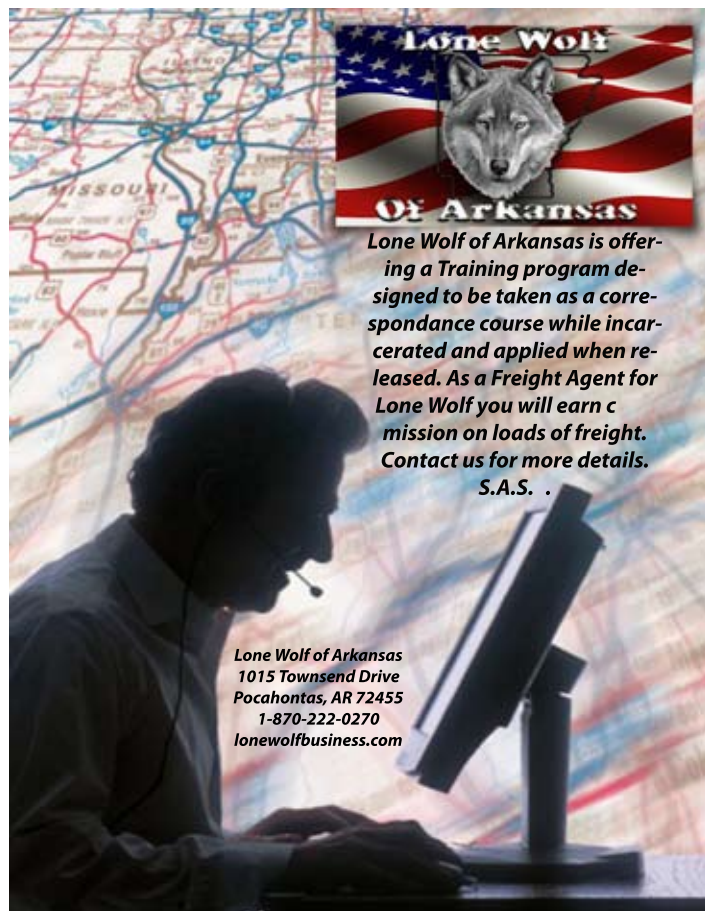

The district court found that Dennis was prejudiced under Brady by the prosecution's withholding of documents related to the two witness statements and the receipt that would have corroborated his alibi. It also held the cumulative effect of the Brady violations provided a basis for granting habeas relief.

"[T]here can be no question" that the state had violated Dennis' right to due process by withholding exculpatory evidence that would have made a material difference at his trial, Judge Brody wrote. "As a result, after serving over 20 years in prison, Dennis is entitled to receive either a new trial or his freedom."

As of July 2014, however, he has received neither. The state appealed the district court's judgment, which has been stayed pending a decision by the Third Circuit. Meanwhile, Dennis remains on Pennsylvania's death row. He is represented pro bono by the law firm of Arnold & Porter, LLP. See: Dennis v. Wetzel, 966 F.Supp.2d 489 (E.D. Pa. 2013). ■

New York Jail Guard Sentenced for Sexually Abusing Seven Prisoners

A FORMER GUARD AT THE MONROE County Correctional Facility in Rochester, New York received six months in jail plus 10 years' probation and was required to register as a sex offender after he pleaded guilty in April 2013 to sexually abusing seven female prisoners.

Former Sgt. Robert Wilson, 41, was sentenced after entering the plea to a 21-count indictment that accused him of engaging in criminal sexual contact with the prisoners for two years, from 2010 to July 2012. The charges included rape, sexual abuse and official misconduct. [See: PLN, Nov. 2013, p.56].

Four of the seven victims filed suit in federal court in October 2013 against Wilson and Monroe County Sheriff Patrick O'Flynn for unspecified compensatory and punitive damages, joining a previous lawsuit that was filed in July. The five suits, which also name Monroe County as a defendant, contend that O'Flynn and the county knew as early as 2010 that Wilson had an "inappropriate relationship" with a female prisoner but did nothing to stop his misconduct.

"These are five women that are at the lowest point in their life," said attorney Robert King, who is representing the victims. "What we know is that this happened time after time after time, woman after woman after woman, inside the jail and in some instances outside the jail after they were released."

Each of the lawsuits claims that "other members of the Monroe County Sheriff's Office allowed Sergeant Wilson to be alone" with the women, and one victim alleged the Sheriff's Office was "alerted to the inappropriate relationship" but "did not investigate.... If they did investigate, the investigation was not sufficient," and officials "did not take action to remedy the situation and prevent future harm."

At the time of his indictment, Wilson was a 17-year veteran and supervisor at the jail; investigators said that for more than two years he used his position to sexually abuse female prisoners. He resigned after being charged.

"I find that Wilson's actions were obviously reprehensible and disturbing, and they are an embarrassment to our organization and to the community we serve," said Sheriff O'Flynn. "He was a supervisor in charge so he had access to the entire facility, and he had very calculated actions to be able to manipulate the system to accommodate his actions."

Investigators said they believe Wilson had relationships with many of the women before they entered the jail; he apparently did not take any of the prisoners off jail property, but did take them out of secure areas at times.

Monroe County District Attorney Sandra Doorley stated the victims deserve justice. "Regardless of what they've done in the past and where they are and what their situation in life is, if they are victims and a law is violated, we will represent their interest in court," she said.

The prisoners' lawsuits allege numerous sexual encounters involving Wilson. One of the victims said Wilson encouraged her "to strip tease in her cell while he watched," then later directed her to perform oral sex. In another case, the victim claimed Wilson called her away from her cell for "unscheduled medical appointments" and led her into an office where he engaged "in personal, flirtatious and sexually explicit conversation."

The same victim's lawsuit also alleges that Wilson told her to "write sexually explicit letters to him, which she did," and "Wilson wrote a sexually explicit letter" back. She also claims that after she was released from jail, Wilson took her to his apartment and "tried to force" her to have sex "but allowed her to give him oral sex instead."

Another of the prisoners said Wilson came to her cell, sat on her bunk and "directed her to show him her breasts." The lawsuit filed by a fourth victim alleges that Wilson took her to a private room for sex after calling her into a hallway with the excuse that he had cleaning chores for her to do.

Authorities said Wilson was not reported by any of the prisoners he victimized; rather, an investigation was initiated after another staff member at the jail reported Wilson for improper use of computers, which led to the discovery of his sexual misconduct. The five lawsuits filed by Wilson's victims all remain pending. See: Goodison, Jansen, Andrews, DiStefano and Knapp v. Monroe County, U.S.D.C. (W.D. # BOP Grievance System Contributes to "Compliance or Defiance" by Prisoners

by Derek Gilna

A 2013 STUDY FOUND THAT THE GRIEVANCE system utilized by the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) appears to have become an important tool to defuse prisoner complaints, supporting the belief that the failure of BOP officials to adequately respond to grievances contributes to higher levels of violence in federal prisons.

The research study determined that another benefit of the BOP's grievance system is deflecting or reducing potential litigation. Indeed, many federal court decisions have been decided in the BOP's favor based upon prisoners' failure to exhaust administrative remedies as required by the Prison Litigation Reform Act.

The study, "Procedural justice and prison: Examining complaints among federal inmates (2000-2007)," was conducted by David M. Bierie with the U.S. Marshals Service and the Department of Criminology and Criminal Justice at the University of Maryland. Although it concentrated on what it termed the "procedural justice paradigm," the study also revealed what Bierie called an unexpected finding: "violence grew as the number of support staff per inmate (e.g., teachers, counselors) declined within a given prison. However, the opposite effect was found with respect to increases in custody staff per inmate within a given prison."

The study appears to validate the BOP's grievance system. "Generally speaking, people feel a process is more 'just' when their voice is heard before decisions are made, decision makers treat everyone equally, outcomes are proportionate, and there is a process of appeal or challenge if they don't agree with an outcome." The opposite is also true if the system is perceived to be unfair; thus, the grievance process plays "a central role in generating compliance or defiance" by prisoners.

The study makes liberal use of other research into the U.S. criminal justice system to lend weight to its conclusions. Several previous studies had found that a grievance system was not only about directly resolving problems, but also allowing prisoners to vent their frustrations and anger about perceived injustices by prison officials without resorting to violence.

According to the 2013 study, prisons "present an environment optimized to magnify the likely impacts of perceived injustice by presenting environments that are characterized by verbal threats and insults, physical pain, unpleasant odors, disgusting scenes, noise, heat, air pollution, personal space violations and high density."

Therefore, "[p]erceived injustice is serious, especially in the eyes of inmates, and the impact and relevance is further magnified by the environment they live in, delivering a near constant state of elevated and clustered strain."

The study found that the BOP's grievance system is perceived by some prisoners as overly formal and more concerned with procedural practices and deadlines than the substance of a complaint. Accordingly, "data suggest a higher volume of late or rejected [grievance] responses will increase violence."

Bierie examined data from the BOP's Sentry system, staffing levels in federal prisons, and other BOP documents showing the number and classification of prisoner grievances over a seven-year period from January 2000 through December 2007.

The research revealed that most complaints concerned issues related to discipline, medical care and staff, with food, housing and use of force at the bottom of the list. The number of procedural grievance rejections and prisoner density (i.e., overcrowding) were tracked, as well as the ratio of prisoners to BOP employees, to determine if a relationship existed between those factors and levels of prisoner violence.

Interestingly, according to the study, the number of grievances appeared to peak in 2004 while assaults and serious violence within BOP facilities increased from 2000 through 2007, perhaps reflecting increased overcrowding in the federal prison system.

In addition to its other findings, the study concluded that "most features of the grievance process ... did not impact violence. Neither the volume of current complaints, nor the distributive justice outcomes predicted violence." However, "[t]wo features of the grievance process consistently predicted ... violence: the proportion of responses which were late, and the proportion of responses which were substantively rejected."

England, Increasing Number of States Allow Same-Sex Prisoner Marriages or Civil Unions

PRISONERS IN ENGLAND, INCLUDING those in the highest security classification, are being allowed to enter into same-sex civil partnerships due to a policy change that mirrors changes to same-sex marriage laws in an increasing number of states in the U.S.

Prison Service Order 4445 outlines the requirements for prisoners in England and Wales seeking to enter into same-sex civil unions. The Order requires that both prisoners be of the same gender, over 16 years old, not related, not currently married and have at least three months remaining on their sentences. The Order also covers transsexual prisoners.

Prisoners are responsible for making all arrangements for the civil partnership ceremony and must pay all associated costs. They are allowed to invite guests, but only a reasonable number as determined by the prison governor. Before authorizing the civil partnership, prison authorities are required to make a risk assessment determination.

The Order applies to the Prison Service's population of around 86,000 prisoners.

In the United States, the Department of Justice announced in a February 2014 memo that it will grant full recognition to same-sex marriages to "the greatest extent possible under the law." U.S. Attorney General Eric Holder said the federal government is committed to equal protection.

"In every courthouse, in every proceeding and in every place where a member of the Department of Justice stands on behalf of the United States – they will strive to ensure that same-sex marriages receive the same privileges, protections, and rights as opposite-sex marriages under federal law," Holder stated.

For federal prisoners, the policy change means that same-sex spouses now have visitation rights, and prisoners can seek furloughs for a crisis involving a same-sex spouse. In federal court, same-sex couples now have the right to refuse to testify against their spouse, even in states that do not recognize same-sex marriages.

Gay rights advocates praised Holder's announcement, saying it will "change the lives of countless committed gay and lesbian couples for the better." Human Rights Campaign President Chad Griffin told the Washington Post, "While the immediate effect of these policy decisions is that all married gay couples will be treated equally under the law, the long-term effects are more profound."

In August 2013, the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) issued a memo extending to state prisoners the right to marry same-sex partners. The memo followed a Supreme Court ruling that overturned Proposition 8, which had prohibited same-sex marriages in the state.

"Effective immediately, all institutions must accept and process applications for a same sex marriage between an inmate and a non-incarcerated person in the community, in the same manner as they do marriages between opposite sex couples," M.D. Stainer, director of the CDCR's Division of Adult Institutions, wrote in the memo.

However, "a currently incarcerated inmate shall not, at this time, be permitted to marry another currently incarcerated inmate" due to security concerns.

In Illinois, prison officials said a policy regarding same-sex marriages will be in place when a statute legalizing such marriages in the state takes effect on June 1, 2014. "The Illinois Department of Corrections will be prepared to implement a policy regarding this law when it goes into effect," said spokesman Tom Shaer. Illinois state prison policy bans the marriage of two prisoners, but prisoners will be able to marry non-prisoners of the same gender.

Marriages between prisoners are also prohibited in Minnesota, but Minnesota Public Radio reported in September 2013 that state prison officials are considering how they will handle marriage requests by sex offenders who have finished their prison sentences but are considered too dangerous to be released. According to the news report, two male prisoners who have been civilly committed contacted local officials to request a marriage license. State law requires marriage license applicants to apply in person, however, and the Minnesota Department of Human Services denied the offenders' request for transportation to the licensing office.

In New York, the State Department of Corrections and Community Supervision held its first same-sex marriage at the Auburn Correctional Facility in December 2011, when a male prisoner married a former prisoner in a civil ceremony. [See: PLN, May 2012, p.37; April 2012, p.50]. ■

Oregon Victim's Right to Restitution Survives Prosecutor's Statutory Violation

by Mark Wilson

THE OREGON COURT OF APPEALS HELD that a prosecutor's failure to comply with state restitution laws did not deprive a trial court of authority to impose restitution after sentencing.

Oregon law requires the prosecutor to "investigate and present to the court, prior to the time of sentencing, evidence of the nature and amount" of a victim's damages resulting from a crime.

Cindie Wagoner was charged with identity theft. On October 15, 2009, the victim provided proof of her economic losses to Flores, a victim advocate assigned to her case by the Washington County District Attorney's Office. However, Flores did not forward that information to the prosecutor.

Wagoner pleaded guilty and was sentenced in December 2009. The prosecutor noted that the time had passed for the victim to request restitution, and the trial court did not award any restitution. The January 5, 2010 judgment in Wagoner's case indicated that the restitution amount was zero.

Flores was terminated the following month. When other employees cleaned out Flores' desk they found the victim's October 15, 2009 proof-of-loss documents.

In March 2010, the victim filed a motion asserting that she had a right to receive prompt restitution under Article I, section 42(1)(d) of the Oregon Constitution.

After a hearing, the trial court agreed that the victim was entitled to restitution; the court then issued a May 24, 2010 supplemental judgment requiring Wagoner to pay restitution of $800.

Wagoner appealed, arguing that because the prosecutor had failed to present evidence of the victim's loss before sentencing as required by ORS 137.106, the trial court had no authority to subsequently impose restitution.

The Oregon Court of Appeals noted that it had "recently addressed a very similar question" in State v. Thompson, 257 Ore. App. 336, 306 P.3d 731 (Or. Ct. App. 2013), and found the ruling in Thompson controlled. The violation of ORS 137.106

"did not prevent the court from imposing restitution in order to provide the victim a remedy by due course of law, after it was discovered that her constitutional right to restitution was violated."

Accordingly, the trial court's order requiring Wagoner to pay restitution was affirmed. See: State v. Wagoner, 257 Ore. App. 607, 307 P.3d 528 (Or. Ct. App. 2013). ■

Habeas Petitioner Cannot Avoid Payment of Appellate Filing Fees

by Michael Brodheim

THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT COURT OF Appeals has held that a prisoner seeking collateral relief cannot avoid paying appellate filing fees.

Following a murder conviction, Indiana prisoner Kelly S. Thomas was sentenced to 65 years in prison. After his appeal and collateral attack were rejected in the state courts, he filed a federal petition for writ of habeas corpus under 28 U.S.C. § 2254. When that was denied he filed a notice of appeal. The district court judge declined to issue a certificate of appealability, instead certifying that the appeal was not taken in good faith.

Based on that certification, Thomas was required to pay appellate fees of $455 before the Seventh Circuit would consider entertaining his appeal, unless he could persuade the appellate court to allow him to proceed in forma pauperis. Even then he would still owe the fees – if he won, they would be shifted to the state as part of the appeal costs; if he lost, the fees would be "payable like any other debt."

Thomas filed a motion requesting that the Court of Appeals disregard the district court's certification of bad faith. He contended that prisoners are simply not required to pay appellate fees assessed under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA).

The Seventh Circuit rejected his argument, noting that appellate fees are authorized by 28 U.S.C. § 1913, which long predates the PLRA. The Court of Appeals gave Thomas 21 days to file a motion for permission to proceed in forma pauperis (which depends on demonstrating that he cannot pay the fees and his appeal is not frivolous) and a certificate of appealability (which is dependant on a "substantial showing of the denial of a constitutional right").

The Seventh Circuit noted that an appeal can be non-frivolous and still fail to meet the standard for a certificate of appealability. Thomas filed a petition for writ of certiorari, which was denied on November 18, 2013. See: Thomas v. Zatecky, 712 F.3d 1004 (7th Cir. 2013), cert. denied. ■

Prison Officials Liable for Private Employer ADA Violations

by Mark Wilson

THE NINTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS held last September that prison officials are liable for violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) committed by private employer contractors.

Arizona law requires state prisoners to work 40 hours per week. Most are employed in the Arizona Department of Corrections' Work Incentive Pay Program (WIPP), earning from 10 to 50 cents per hour. Prisoners who work for Arizona Correctional Industries (ACI), which provides prison labor for private company contractors, earn significantly more.

One of those companies is Eurofresh, "America's largest greenhouse operation," which boasts that it can produce 200 million pounds of hydroponic tomatoes annually.

In July 2008, Arizona prisoner William W. Castle was hired by Eurofresh as a tomato picker, earning more than $2.25 an hour. He was required to push a 600-pound tomato cart and stand or walk during his entire seven-hour shift.

Castle soon began suffering ankle swelling and pain when he stood longer than two hours. Decades earlier, Castle had received a 20% service-connected disability rating for an ankle injury sustained in an Army parachute accident.

After a Eurofresh supervisor told Castle he would be fired for taking breaks to rest his ankle, Castle asked ACI and Eurofresh to be reassigned to a different position. His request was denied and he was told his only option was to quit. Prison officials then moved Castle to a WIPP job in the motor pool, which paid only 50 cents an hour.

Castle filed suit against Eurofresh and state prison officials, claiming they had violated the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act by failing to accommodate his disability. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants and Castle appealed.

The Ninth Circuit reversed summary judgment as to the prison officials, rejecting their argument that they lacked authority over Eurofresh employment decisions.

Following Armstrong v. Schwarzenegger, 622 F.3d 1058 (9th Cir. 2010) [PLN, Nov. 2011, p.28], the appellate court observed that government officials are liable for ADA violations committed by private contractors.

Since ACI admittedly contracted with Eurofresh to provide "benefits" to prisoners, including paid labor and vocational training, the Court of Appeals concluded that "one benefit State Defendants may not harvest is immunity for ADA violations: State Defendants are obligated to ensure that Eurofresh – like all other State contractors – complies with federal laws prohibiting discrimination on the basis of disability."

Noting that the en banc court in Hale v. Arizona, 993 F.2d 1387 (9th Cir. 1993) [PLN, Sept. 1993, p.8] had held that prisoners are not "employees" entitled to minimum wage under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Ninth Circuit found that "Castle is not Eurofresh's employee under the ADA because his labor belongs to the State of Arizona." Therefore, Eurofresh was not liable for its ADA violations and was entitled to summary judgment.

"Castle's claims against Eurofresh were properly dismissed because Castle and Eurofresh were not in an employment relationship, and Eurofresh does not receive federal financial assistance. However, judgment was improperly granted to the State Defendants. The State Defendants are liable for disability discrimination committed by a contractor," the Court of Appeals concluded.

"A profit-seeking firm that hires convicts at its own worksite should not be shielded from the costs of compliance with the ADA," Circuit Judge Marsha S. Berzon wrote in a concurring opinion, encouraging reconsideration of Hale. "Permitting private employers to escape those costs while profiting from the use of prison labor markets undermines the enforcement of the statutory requirements generally, by creating incentives for competing employers to shirk compliance with regard to non-prison labor – and thereby economically disadvantaging competitors of those employers using prison labor."

Nevertheless, noting that precedent "forecloses consideration of such concerns," Judge Berzon reluctantly concurred that Hale precludes a finding that Castle was an "employee" under federal law. Thus, his only remedy is against Arizona prison officials. See: Castle v. Eurofresh, 731 F.3d 901 (9th Cir. 2013).

The case remains pending on remand, with the Arizona Department of Corrections filing a renewed motion for summary judgment on April 14, 2014. Castle, who has been released from prison, is proceeding pro se. ■

Seventh Circuit Reverses Summary Judgment in Dental Care Suit

by David M. Reutter

ON JULY 19, 2013, THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT Court of Appeals reversed a grant of summary judgment to three defendants, holding there was sufficient evidence for a jury to find they acted with deliberate indifference to a prisoner's serious dental needs.

Richard M. Smego, a civil detainee at Illinois' Rushville Treatment and Detention Center, filed suit in federal court alleging that a dentist, two doctors and a dental hygienist had violated his constitutional rights.

When Smego arrived at Rushville, Dr. Jacqueline Mitchell, a dentist who contracts with Wexford Health Sources, examined him in December 2005 and found he had twelve teeth with cavities. She promised to begin filling them in early 2006.

Yet it was not until June 24, 2007 – eighteen months later – that Dr. Mitchell saw Smego again. She provided no care during that visit, and it was not until the next month that she installed a temporary filling in one tooth but did nothing for his most painful tooth. In August 2007, she extracted the painful tooth and prescribed Motrin, a painkiller to which Smego was allergic.

Smego complained to his therapist about his persistent dental pain in November 2007, almost two years after he first saw Dr. Mitchell. The therapist informed Dr. Michael Bednarz, Rushville's Medical Director, and Mitchell assured him that Smego was receiving appropriate care.

Dr. Hughes Lochard, a Wexford physician who saw Smego for an unrelated medical issue, examined Smego's teeth. While he said he did not want to get involved in dental issues, he prescribed Motrin for the pain and refused to prescribe any other medication.

Dr. Mitchell did not see Smego again until 2008, when she placed fillings in three of his teeth; three days after that visit, Smego filed his federal civil rights action. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants and he appealed.

The Seventh Circuit disagreed with the district court's conclusion that Smego had failed to state viable claims or only alleged negligence by the defendants. The Court of Appeals found a jury could conclude that Mitchell failed "to spare Smego thirty months of serious dental pain by providing the treatment she herself already decided was necessary." Moreover, "Dr. Mitchell admitted that even five years after she had diagnosed Smego's cavities she still had not begun treating at least two of them," the appellate court noted.

There was ample evidence of Mitchell's personal contact with Smego, which made her aware of his tooth decay and pain. A jury could also conclude, the Seventh Circuit wrote, that what little care Dr. Mitchell provided was inappropriate.

The dental hygienist, Kelly Lawshea, told Smego to not be a "pest" when he spoke to her about his pain and difficulty in obtaining dental treatment. While she could not be held liable for failing to schedule treatment or obtain supplies that were blamed as the cause of the delay in treatment, a jury could find her "pest" statement "discouraged Smego from taking more aggressive steps to receive treatment from the dental office."

As to Dr. Bednarz, the Court of Appeals found that Smego failed to present sufficient evidence of deliberate indifference. Bednarz took action by contacting Dr. Mitchell, and he was allowed to rely on her representations absent clear evidence that those representations were false. The opposite conclusion was reached as to Dr. Lochard, however. He never contacted Mitchell and did not defer to her, and had also prescribed the ineffective treatment of Motrin. In the latter regard, the Seventh Circuit noted that in a different case, another "Wexford physician repeatedly prescribed ibuprofen (the active ingredient in Motrin) despite a known allergy," citing Olive v. Wexford Corp., 494 Fed. Appx. 671 (7th Cir. 2012).

The district court's summary judgment order was vacated as to Mitchell, Lawshea and Lochard, and remanded for further proceedings. See: Smego v. Mitchell, 723 F.3d 752 (7th Cir. 2013).

Following remand, Smego moved to disqualify U.S. District Court Judge Harold A. Baker from presiding over the case. He pointed out that Judge Baker had dismissed two of his lawsuits, both with findings that an appeal would be in bad faith. Both times, Smego appealed and the Seventh Circuit remanded the cases to the district court. Further, in one of those cases, Judge Baker had stated during a hearing that he wouldn't believe Smego "on a stack of Bibles." The judge also told the jurors after they ruled for the defendants that they had "vindicated" him, apparently referring to his prior dismissal of the case.

Judge Baker granted Smego's motion and recused himself on January 31, 2014. Smego subsequently settled his claims against Lawshea and Dr. Lochard in May 2014, while his claims against Dr. Mitchell are scheduled for trial on July 15, 2014. Notably, Smego litigated this case pro se, including on appeal. See: Smego v. Adams, U.S.D.C. (C.D. Ill.), Case No. 3:08-cv-03142-SEM-TSH. ■

Judge May Resolve Exhaustion Issue; No Policy on Grievance Non-decisions Means Remedies Unavailable

by David Reutter

THE THIRD CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS held on August 26, 2013 that a judge may resolve factual disputes relevant to the exhaustion of administrative remedies without the participation of a jury. It also held the district court had erred in finding a failure to exhaust where a prisoner did not receive a response to his grievances and appeals were not required in such circumstances.

Robert L. Small, a pretrial detainee at New Jersey's Camden County Correctional Facility (CCCF) and a paraplegic, filed a civil rights complaint alleging excessive force, denial of medical treatment, and confiscation of his wheelchair and its replacement with one without leg rests. The suit concerned events during two stints that Small served at CCCF between June and September 2004 and again between May 2005 and January 2008.

The lawsuit, originally filed in 2006, was amended by pro bono counsel in January 2008. The defendants moved for summary judgment in late 2009, claiming Small had failed to exhaust administrative remedies under CCCF's grievance policy. The district court dismissed all but one of Small's claims following an evidentiary hearing, and he appealed.

Small argued the Prison Litigation Reform Act requires that a jury, not a judge, determine factual disputes related to administrative exhaustion issues because Seventh Amendment rights are implicated.

The Third Circuit disagreed, joining the Second, Fifth, Seventh, Ninth and Eleventh Circuits in concluding "that judges may resolve factual disputes relevant to the exhaustion issue without the participation of a jury."

The appellate court then turned to the exhaustion issue itself. First, it found "Small knew of, and was able to access, CCCF's grievance procedures." Having concluded that administrative remedies were available to him, the Court of Appeals considered whether he had substantially complied with the jail's grievance process.

Small argued he had complied by submitting sick call requests and letters of complaint, some of which were sent to people outside CCCF. The Third Circuit held those efforts were not substantially compliant with CCCF's grievance procedure.

However, as to two grievances that Small filed concerning incidents in 2005, the Court of Appeals held the district court had erred in finding Small did not comply with CCCF's grievance policy because he failed to appeal.

It was undisputed that neither of the grievances had resulted in a decision by jail staff, and the appellate court said it disagreed "that substantial compliance with CCCF's procedures requires appealing non-decisions." Rather, the jail's grievance policy addressed "only the appeal of a decision with which the inmate is not satisfied," and did not "mention what must be done or even could be done by the inmate when a decision is never made."

As CCCF's grievance procedure "did not contemplate an appeal from a non-decision ... the appeals process was unavailable" to Small. The Third Circuit thus affirmed in part and reversed and remanded as to claims related to the two grievances that did not result in decisions by jail staff. See: Small v. Camden County, 728 F.3d 265 (3d Cir. 2013).

Following remand, the district court appointed counsel to represent Small on February 21, 2014. This case, now eight years old, remains pending. ■

New York Prisoner Awarded Sanctions for Spoliation of Evidence; Case Settles for $500,000

by Mark Wilson

ON SEPTEMBER 4, 2013, A NEW YORK federal district court held that a jail official was precluded from testifying in a prisoner's lawsuit about what she supposedly witnessed on surveillance video footage that had been erased. The court also granted the prisoner's request for an adverse inference jury instruction and attorney's fees.

In May 2011, guards did not intervene as New York City jail detainee Dwaine Taylor was savagely beaten by several gang members, including Batise Boyce, in a courthouse holding cell. He wasn't removed from the cell for approximately three hours.

When Taylor was finally taken to an emergency room, he was diagnosed with "jaw fractures on both ... sides of his face," an impacted tooth and another loose tooth. During surgery the next day, doctors closed the "jaw fractures with a metal plate and screws," removed one of his teeth and wired his jaw shut. Taylor was hospitalized for three days and then returned to the infirmary at the Rikers Island jail, where he remained for another month.

Within 15 days, officials prepared "an investigation 'package' recommending that Boyce be 're-arrested' for assaulting" Taylor. That package included copies of surveillance video footage. One week later, Boyce was indicted.

Taylor served notice of his intent to sue and on July 31, 2012 filed a failure to protect suit against jail officials in federal court. He alleged that the assault was sanctioned by guards "under a widespread practice called 'the Program,'" which permitted gang members to attack other non-gang-associated prisoners as a means of control.

"A ceiling-mounted, twenty-four hour surveillance camera" captured events in the holding cell during the assault. Assistant Deputy Warden Executive Officer Jacqueline Brantley reviewed the entire three hours of the video but saved just eight minutes, and the remaining footage was erased.

On June 7, 2013, Taylor moved for spoliation of evidence sanctions. The defendants claimed they had no duty to preserve the remaining three hours of video footage and that Brantley should be allowed to testify as to what the rest of the footage depicted.

The district court disagreed, holding that Brantley was precluded from testifying about what she observed on the deleted surveillance footage. The court also granted Taylor's request for an adverse inference jury instruction and an award of reasonable attorney's fees and costs in connection with the motion for sanctions.

The case settled in October 2013, with the defendants agreeing to pay $500,000 inclusive of fees and costs. Taylor was represented by the Legal Aid Society and the law firm of Emery Celli Brinckerhoff & Abady, LLP. See: Taylor v. City of New York, U.S.D.C. (S.D. NY), Case No. 1:12-cv-05881-RPP. ■

Seventh Circuit Admits Prisoner is Right but Denies Relief, Suggests Clemency

THE ARMED CAREER CRIMINAL ACT (ACCA), 18 U.S.C. § 924(e), mandates sentence enhancements for certain federal defendants who commit crimes with firearms; those who have three or more prior "violent felonies" or "serious" drug offenses face a minimum 15-year prison term.

In some cases, however, prior state convictions should not qualify as "predicate" offenses for the purpose of triggering an ACCA sentence enhancement.

In April 2014, the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals issued a ruling in a case involving federal prisoner Cody F. Ellerman, who had challenged his ACCA enhanced sentence for being a felon in possession of a firearm.

The appellate court noted that "Ellerman's frustration with his inability to obtain relief is understandable given that he is correct, on the merits, that he never should have been sentenced as an armed career criminal." The Court of Appeals found that "His prior drug convictions were all for selling marijuana in Kansas, ... and as level 3 felonies, did not subject him to a statutory maximum of at least ten years.... Accordingly, those convictions did not qualify as 'serious drug offenses' under 18 U.S.C. § 924(e)(2)(A)(ii), and Ellerman should not have been sentenced as an armed career criminal."

However, he had not filed a direct appeal to his 2003 conviction, his post-conviction appeals were untimely and the Seventh Circuit wrote it was "not empowered to correct the sentencing error."

The appellate court concluded: "Having fallen victim to the procedural complexity of collateral attacks, Ellerman is out of judicial remedies. But he may consider asking the President for a pardon or to commute his sentence." See: Ellerman v. Walton, Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, Case No. 14-501 (April 21, 2014).

In cases raising similar issues, scores of federal prisoners convicted in North Carolina have been found legally innocent in firearm possession cases, including cases involving ACCA enhancements. Yet some of those prisoners have been denied relief and remain incarcerated, too. [See related article in this issue of PLN, p. 48].

Ellerman informed PLN in June 2014 that, following the suggestion of the Seventh Circuit, he had filed a petition for commutation with the Office of the Pardon Attorney. That may be an even longer shot than trying to obtain judicial relief, however, considering President Obama's paltry track record of granting requests for clemency. [See: PLN, Jan. 2013, p.32; May 2011, p.36].

In February 2014, the U.S. Department of Justice announced an expanded clemency initiative; the administration apparently has taken the change seriously, replacing Pardon Attorney Ronald Rodgers in April 2014.

The initiative may not help Ellerman's chances for commutation, though, as it only applies to federal prisoners who have served at least 10 years of their sentence, have no significant prior convictions, and were convicted of a nonviolent crime that would have resulted in a lower sentence had they been sentenced today. The expanded clemency initiative will be covered in greater detail in a future issue of PLN. ■

North Carolina Repeals Racial Justice Law

IN JUNE 2013, NORTH CAROLINA Governor Pat McCrory signed legislation repealing the state's Racial Justice Act of 2009 (the Act), a controversial law that supporters said was an effort to address racism in death penalty cases. Opponents, however, argued it merely clogged the legal system and denied justice to victims of the state's 154 prisoners sentenced to death.

"Nearly every person on death row, regardless of race, has appealed their death sentence under the Racial Justice Act," Governor McCrory said in a statement that accompanied his repeal of the law. "The state's district attorneys are nearly unanimous in their bipartisan conclusion that the Racial Justice Act created a judicial loophole to avoid the death penalty and not a path to justice."

The Act was passed following the exoneration of three North Carolina prisoners who had been wrongfully convicted and sentenced to death. All were black. [See, e.g.: PLN, Aug. 2010, p.32].

The Racial Justice Act allowed condemned prisoners to challenge a death sentence "sought or obtained on the basis of race" if they could prove that race was a factor in their prosecution, jury selection or sentencing, and to petition to reduce their sentence to life in prison without the possibility of parole. According to the North Carolina Department of Public Safety, slightly more than half – approximately 53% – of the state's death row prisoners are African-American. U.S. Census Bureau statistics indicate that blacks only comprise around 22% of the state's population.

When the Act was passed in 2009, opponents contended it was a thinly-veiled attempt by a Democratic governor and a Democrat-controlled state legislature to essentially do away with capital punishment. Due to various legal appeals, North Carolina has not carried out an execution since 2006. Republicans took control of the legislature in 2010, and McCrory, a Republican, was elected in 2012.

"It [the Act] tries to put a carte blanche solution on the problem," said Republican state Rep. Tim Moore. "A white supremacist who murdered an African-American could argue he was a victim of racism if blacks were on the jury."

Colon Willoughby, the district attorney in Wake County, which surrounds Raleigh, the state capital, said death row prisoners can already petition to reduce their sentences on the basis of racial bias under a U.S. Supreme Court ruling. He said the Racial Justice Act "came about and set up new artificial obstacles and barriers that were designed simply to put a moratorium on the death penalty and not to promote justice for anyone." As a result, he argued, the Act did nothing but clog North Carolina's courts.

"The premise of it is that somehow, because juries were white, that they discriminated against people, both white and black," he said. "The whole underlying concept of it is ridiculous."

"It's incredibly sad," countered Democratic state Rep. Rick Glazier, a long-time supporter of the Act. "If you can't face up to your history and make sure it's not repeated, it lends itself to being repeated."

Four prisoners have had their death sentences reduced to life without parole under the Act, all in 2012. In Cumberland County, the court cited a study which strongly suggested racial bias in jury selection. Researchers from Michigan State University who studied North Carolina cases between 1990 and 2010 found that prosecutors removed black citizens from juries in murder trials at more than twice the rate of other races.

"We think that essentially this legislature is sweeping evidence of racial bias under the rug, and it's really disappointing," said Sarah Preston, policy director for the ACLU of North Carolina. "Instead of looking at the cases that have passed as evidence of the necessity for the law, they have decided that it's evidence that the law should be repealed."

Preston and other legal experts said the question now is whether appeals still pending under the now-repealed Act will go forward or be dismissed. "Everyone who has made a claim under the Racial Justice Act is probably going to have to litigate over whether or not they continue to have a claim," Preston said.

The North Carolina legislature had been chipping away at the law ever since Republican control in the state government grew stronger. In 2012, the state House and Senate overrode then-Democratic Governor Bev Perdue's veto of legislation gutting the Act, replacing it with an amended law that made it more difficult for prisoners to challenge their death sentences. Instead of using race-related statistics from the entire state or region, appeals under the Act were limited to statistical data from the judicial district where the crime occurred. The amended law also specified that statistics alone were not enough to prove racial bias, and that the race of the victim could not be considered.

The amended Act was written by Republican House Majority Leader Paul "Skip" Stam, who touted the measure as a means of ending the lengthy halt to executions in North Carolina.

"With [the] override of the governor's veto, the end of the moratorium is in sight," Stam said following the July 2, 2012 vote to amend the Racial Justice Act. "The basic principal of justice is restored: individual responsibility."

In debate leading up to the vote, local district attorneys and other supporters of the death penalty said changes to the Act would allow defendants to rely less on statistics that could mislead judges into finding that racism played a role in convictions and death sentences.

"I don't trust statisticians or people who came in after the fact to find some way to get cold-blooded killers off of death row," said state Senator Thom Goolsby, who is also a defense attorney.

"We should not allow racism to come into our courtrooms," countered state Senator Floyd McKissick during the veto debate. "Race still impacts the minds and the hearts and the consciences of many people who serve on our juries."

The Senate easily overrode then-Governor Perdue's veto, but in the House the vote was 72-48 – exactly the 60% majority needed. After using her veto power, Perdue said she supported the death penalty. "But it has to be carried out fairly – free of prejudice," she added.

In December 2012, following the legislative amendment to the Act, then-Superior Court Judge Gregory A. Weeks reduced the death sentences of three prisoners – two black and one Native American – to life without parole.

According to the American Bar Association, "Judge Weeks found that the prisoners met their burdens of proof ...

through the use of statewide and county-specific statistical evidence, as well as non-statistical evidence. This 'powerful evidence of race consciousness and race-based decision making' included hand-written notes from the Cumberland County prosecutor that noted the race of potential jurors who were black, sometimes associating them with drug or alcohol abuse. The prosecutor also repeatedly noted which potential jurors lived in predominantly black neighborhoods.... The prosecutor's notes did not indicate which potential jurors were white or lived in predominately white neighborhoods. Judge Weeks' ruling also noted that prosecutors had a 'cheat sheet' that instructed prosecutors how to deflect charges of racial bias in jury strikes. In one case, the prosecution struck black jurors at twice the rate of white jurors; in the other two cases, the rate was four times as high."

The court's ruling was "based primarily on the words and deeds of the prosecutors involved in these cases," Judge Weeks said. "Despite protestations to the contrary, their words, their deeds, speak volumes. During presentation of evidence, the court finds powerful and persuasive evidence of racial consciousness, race-based decision making in the writings of prosecutors long buried in the case files and brought to light for the first time during this hearing."

Now that the Racial Justice Act has been repealed, however, whether death penalty cases in North Carolina will be "free of prejudice" – the phrase used by former Governor Perdue – is again a matter of debate.

On April 14, 2014, the North Carolina Supreme Court agreed to hear appeals in the cases of the four prisoners whose death sentences were reduced to life without parole under the Act – Marcus Robinson, Tilmon Golphin, Christina Walters and Quintel Augustine. Prosecutors are seeking to have their death sentences reinstated. The state Supreme Court is composed of seven justices; one is black and the other six are white. Not that race matters, of course. ■

Prison Closures Cause Economic Turmoil

SHRINKING STATE BUDGETS ACROSS THE country are leading to prison closures that in turn have a negative impact on communities that depend on the facilities as a source of jobs and revenue. [See: PLN, June 2013, p.1; April 2009, p.1]. Small towns in Kentucky, Georgia and New York are among those facing recent adjustments to this new economic reality, but some local residents and lawmakers have fought back with campaigns to keep the prisons open.

The city of Wheelwright, Kentucky was hit hard by the closure of the 600-bed Otter Creek Correctional Center, a prison owned and operated by Corrections Corporation of America (CCA). Officials said over 170 jobs were lost, although CCA pledged to relocate as many employees as possible to other facilities. The company said the June 2012 closing of Otter Creek was necessary after Kentucky did not renew its contact to house state prisoners at the facility.

"A lot of them [the employees] live within the city and a lot of them live in the community, you know," said Andy Akers, Wheelwright's mayor. "We're a tight knit community around here." Just before the closure of the prison, Akers had predicted a devastating impact on local businesses, fearing the city's economy would suffer.

"If you don't have jobs you can't spend money at them. Money keeps rolling over and over when you spend it," he said. "I hate to see it closing, but if there's any way we can help we're trying."

Kentucky also declined to renew its last contract with CCA in June 2013, to house prisoners at the company's 826-bed Marion Adjustment Center in St. Mary. State officials said the decision would save $1.5 to $2.5 million per year, and the prisoners will be moved to other facilities. CCA vice president Steve Owen said the non-renewal of the contract, resulting in the closure of the prison, was "disappointing" – though he was likely referring to the economic impact it would have on the company rather than the local community.

Kentucky DOC spokesperson Jennifer Brislin said the state would assist the 166 CCA employees whose jobs were eliminated due to the facility's closure.

"We understand that this creates uncertainty for them," she stated. "We're mindful that this creates an enormous challenge." However, "It's just to help with applications and the like," she clarified. "Obviously, that doesn't guarantee a job" elsewhere.

Additionally, CCA announced in December 2013 that it would be closing the North Georgia Detention Center in Gainesville, Georgia due to a decline in the number of immigration detainees held at the facility. The closure will affect around 130 employees.

City Manager Kip Padgett said they "will be exploring all options for future use of the facility"; Gainesville had expected to receive $825,000 in rent from the CCA-operated detention center for fiscal year 2014. The facility also had a $7 million payroll and CCA spent around $295,000 with local businesses.

"It was news to us," Gainesville Mayor Pro-Tem Bob Hamrick said, in regard to CCA's unexpected announcement that it was closing the detention center. "Obviously, it is a blow to our employment here. But, hopefully, we can come up with some way to not only absorb the employees that will be laid off but also to find some use for that facility."

In New York, a community group organized to prevent the state from closing the Chateaugay Correctional Facility as scheduled on July 26, 2014, which will eliminate up to 111 jobs with a $5.8 million annual payroll. The Save Chateaugay Correctional Facility Task Force published a 30-page booklet describing the impact the closure will have on the community and Franklin County.

For example, the booklet compares the number of jobs lost in Chateaugay to the equivalent of 6,000 jobs lost in Brooklyn. It also notes that Chateaugay is the state's newest medium-security prison, and that it will cost less to operate once the facility starts using natural gas instead of fuel oil, taking advantage of a pipeline project in the county.

Chateaugay is one of four prisons scheduled to close under a proposal announced by New York Governor Andrew Cuomo in July 2013, but state lawmakers questioned whether the closures are truly justified. State Senator Kathleen Marchione, who has been critical of the plan, said "misplaced priorities" are to blame for closing 15 New York correctional facilities since 2011. She said she will fight to keep open the Mt. McGregor prison, a medium-security facility located in the legislative district she represents.

"The closure of Mt. McGregor would cost our community 320 public safety positions and hurt the local economy," Marchione argued. "I disagree with the administration's closure proposal that would impact the public safety professionals who serve New York with honor and work in some of the toughest, most stressful and dangerous conditions imaginable."

In addition to Chateaugay and Mt. McGregor, the Cuomo administration has announced the closure of the Butler Correctional Facility in Red Creek and Monterey Shock Facility in Beaver Dams. Closing the four prisons will save an estimated $30 million.

Groups that represent prison employees have mounted opposition to the closures, claiming that shutting down the four facilities does nothing to alleviate the condition of more than 10,000 state prisoners who are still double-bunked due to steps taken by former Governor Mario Cuomo in the 1990s to address prison overcrowding.

The New York State Correctional Officers & Police Benevolent Association called the state's decision to close the prisons "political posturing," "insulting" and "a show of disrespect." The association called on its members to hold rallies, sign petitions and contact their legislators to oppose the closures, urging them to "Stand with your brothers and sisters and stop the closures of more prisons and mental health agencies! Enough is enough! Your facility could be next!"

Local resolutions have been passed by officials in the cities and counties affected by the prison closures, including the towns of Wilton and Chateaugay as well as Chemung, Franklin, Wayne and Saratoga Counties.

Contending that the legislature was blindsided by the Cuomo administration's plan, Senator Marchione and State Assemblyman James Tedisco both introduced bills that would require approval by state lawmakers before any prisons could be closed. The legislation would also require the state to announce closings at least a year in advance.

Although the four facilities are expected to close as planned, the legislature imposed a two-year moratorium – until July 2016 – on any further prison closures.

Officials with the state Department of Corrections and Community Supervision (DOCCS) said the crime rate in New York has fallen 13% over the past decade, reducing the need for prison capacity. Further, the state's prison population has dropped nearly 24% since 1999, from 71,600 to around 54,100.

"As the inmate population has continued to decline, prisons that are no longer needed can close," stated DOCCS Commissioner Anthony J. Annucci. "By pursuing policies that are tough, smart and fair, we can maintain or improve public safety on the outside, so there is less need to put offenders on the inside, delivering great savings to New York."

Meanwhile, prison officials pledged to do what they can to soften the impact on state employees. "At the time of the closure announcement there were 673 employees at the four facilities," according to a DOCCS statement. "As of February 3, 2014, there were 386 staff remaining, and DOCCS personnel have been holding another round of meetings with those staff members to assist in planning their transitions."

State officials noted that since the closings were announced there has been "a gradual transition of staff to other prisons, other state agencies or retirement." ■

Administrators Fired at Privately-Run Texas Jail

THE WARDEN AND HEAD OF SECURITY at the Liberty County Jail (LCJ) in Liberty, Texas have been fired in the wake of allegations that the chief of security sexually assaulted a female prisoner at the facility. The 285-bed jail is operated by the New Jersey-based Community Education Centers (CEC), a for-profit company.

Warden Timothy New and Chief of Security Kenneth Reid Nunn were fired in September 2012, just days after the county received a notice of claim from attorney Paul Houston LaValle on behalf of former LCJ prisoner Brandy Nichole O'Brien. O'Brien had been incarcerated at LCJ for failing to make timely child support payments.

According to the notice of claim, O'Brien "was repeatedly subjected to assault and battery, sexual assault, deviant sexual assault, humiliation, degradation and intentional infliction of emotional distress at the hands of Chief of Security Kenneth Reid Nunn and others" while incarcerated at the privately-run lock-up.

"Further, when Chief Nunn was repeatedly caught violating my client's rights by other members of the jail staff or sheriff's office, my client was threatened, coerced and coached on the statements she gave to investigators by Warden Tim New and others," LaValle wrote.

In a statement announcing the terminations of New and Nunn, CEC said it was working with law enforcement to investigate staff at the jail.

"The allegations, which have just come to the company's attention, apparently began approximately a year ago when, as a weekender, [O'Brien] encountered the jail's former employees and began cooperating with law enforcement," said CEC representative Christopher Creeder.

Liberty County has a $4 million annual contract with CEC to operate the jail. CEC manages eight secure facilities in Ohio, Pennsylvania and Texas, and "provides a full range of therapeutic residential and non-residential reentry services with a documented record of reducing recidivism," according to the company's website. ■

North Carolina: Hundreds of Federal Prisoners Legally Innocent, Some Still Incarcerated

by Derek Gilna

FOLLOWING A 2011 FEDERAL APPELLATE court ruling, the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) initially tried to delay the release of federal prisoners who were wrongly convicted in North Carolina. The government later announced that it would halt such tactics, but has continued to oppose challenges filed by some offenders who are legally innocent.

The DOJ's actions followed a review of prosecutions in three federal courts in North Carolina. DOJ spokesman Wyn Hornbuckle said "many more" cases could surface when all of the state's federal court cases are examined.

The prisoners were convicted of possessing firearms in what the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals held was a misapplication of the sentencing criteria, a circumstance unique to North Carolina due to the state's system of "structured sentencing." Adopted by the state legislature in 1993, the system mandates that the maximum prison term for any given crime is based on the offender's criminal record. As a result, sentences for even minor crimes can extend for years if a defendant has numerous prior offenses.

Federal law provides that anyone convicted of a crime punishable by more than a year in prison is considered a felon, and thereby prohibited from possessing a firearm or ammunition. However, that provision of federal law, as imposed by North Carolina federal courts, conflicted with the state's structured sentencing.

For example, an offender convicted of a minor crime in a North Carolina state court – writing a bad check, for example – would be considered a felon under federal law if his or her prior record was serious enough to warrant a prison sentence longer than a year. Federal courts proceeded under the notion that if one person convicted of writing a bad check was considered a felon, then all offenders convicted of writing bad checks were felons ... even if a defendant's record warranted a sentence of less than one year under the state's structured sentencing system. Consequently, offenders found in possession of a firearm were charged with violating federal law even if their prior state offenses should not have been considered felonies.

The Fourth Circuit held in August 2011, in United States v. Simmons, 649 F.3d 237 (4th Cir. 2011) (en banc), that federal courts had been misapplying the law. Only those offenders who could have actually faced a prison sentence of longer than a year, the appellate court held, should be considered felons under federal law. As a result, scores of federal defendants should not have been prosecuted for being felons in possession of a firearm, because they didn't meet the legal definition of "felon" at the time they were charged.

The ruling in Simmons meant that about half of the convictions in North Carolina state courts over the past decade should no longer be considered felonies under federal law. A 2012 investigation by USA Today concluded that "none of them [prisoners serving time for firearm possession] had criminal records serious enough to make them felons under federal law."

USA Today's investigation examined firearm possession convictions in western North Carolina between 2005 and 2011, and "was limited to people who had been convicted only of gun possession and included only those cases in which federal prosecutors had specifically identified the prior offense that made possession a crime."

In the wake of Simmons, the DOJ initially did little to address the problem of offenders serving federal prison terms despite being legally innocent. In fact, the Department of Justice did not try to identify or notify the affected prisoners, and even argued in individual prisoners' cases that they should not be released.

DOJ officials claimed it wasn't their responsibility to inform prisoners who were serving sentences for what the Fourth Circuit had determined was no longer a crime. While federal prosecutors conceded the prisoners were innocent, they maintained that offenders affected by Simmons had to follow federal court rules and file motions challenging their convictions and sentences.

"We can't be outcome driven," said Anne Tompkins, the U.S. Attorney in Charlotte. "We've got to make sure we follow the law, and people should want us to do that." She added that her office was "looking diligently for ways, within the confines of the law, to recommend relief for defendants who are legally innocent."

That effort apparently was not a high priority, however. Ripley Rand, the U.S. Attorney in Greensboro who conducted the DOJ's review of cases affected by Simmons, conceded that more than a third of the firearm cases prosecuted by his office might be called into question. "We're going to be addressing this for a while," he remarked. In fact, the 20 prosecutors in his office were so inundated by prisoners challenging their sentences that other prosecutions were placed on hold. "It's definitely been a huge burden," Rand said.

"No one wants anyone to spend time in jail who should not be there," noted one prosecutor in Raleigh, but convictions that are already final "are in a totally different posture and require us to follow the existing statutory habeas law." Rand added that he was "not aware of any procedural mechanism by which [the affected prisoners] can be afforded relief."

Defense attorneys disagreed, saying federal prosecutors should assume a greater role in identifying cases for review. "We're doing it with our hands tied," said Eric Placke, a Greensboro public defender. "I appreciate the compelling considerations they have to deal with. But I do think in cases of actual innocence that it would be nice, to say the least, if they would be a little more proactive." He said his office was handicapped by limited access to records in closed cases.

Legal experts agreed that the procedural approach to such cases was not an easy one. Saying "I'm innocent" may not be sufficient for a successful challenge, according to Nancy King, a law professor at Vanderbilt University. Nevertheless, she noted, "innocent people should be able to get out of prison."

Following Simmons, federal judges have freed numerous prisoners and removed others from post-release supervision. Some had been incarcerated for up to eight years. Since Simmons was decided, it has been cited in over 200 Fourth Circuit decisions and more than 960 rulings in North Carolina district courts as of July 1, 2014.

One of the first federal prisoners to have his conviction vacated was Terrell McCullum. Prosecutors had opposed his release. "At most, [McCullum] has become legally innocent of the charges against him," federal prosecutors stated in an April 2012 court filing, arguing that he still had a criminal record and possessed a gun, and should not be freed.

In August 2012, U.S. District Court Judge James Fox rejected the prosecution's arguments and reversed McCullum's conviction "in the interests of justice," even though he had already completed his sentence and been released a month earlier.

"After careful consideration, the Department of Justice has decided to take a litigating position designed to accelerate relief for defendants in these cases who, by virtue of a subsequent court decision, are no longer guilty of a federal crime," DOJ spokeswoman Adora Andy said shortly before the court ruled in McCullum's case. "We are working with the court, the probation office and the federal public defenders to ensure that these matters are addressed as effectively and quickly as possible."

Another federal prisoner, Marion Howard, was freed on December 5, 2012 after appealing to the court in a letter to "please rule on my case before the holidays" so he could be home with his family. Many other prisoners have since been released as a result of the Simmons decision, and cases are still working their way through the court system.

On May 23, 2014, for example, U.S.

District Court Judge Martin Reidinger ruled on a pro se habeas petition filed by federal prisoner Marvin Barnette. "The Government concedes that the Petitioner's motion has merit, and although the motion was untimely presented, the Government agrees to waive the defense of the statute of limitations to Petitioner's claims," the court said.

"Petitioner's sentence was enhanced based on his prior convictions for breaking and entering.... As the Government concedes, and as reflected by the state-court judgments relevant to these convictions, these offenses were Class H felonies, and at the time Petitioner was convicted of these offenses, Petitioner was a prior record level II," Judge Reidinger wrote. "As such, the maximum sentence Petitioner could have received for either of these offenses was 10 months. Because Petitioner could not have received a sentence of more than one year in prison based on these convictions under North Carolina law, Simmons dictates that these convictions no longer qualify as 'violent felonies' for purposes of the ACCA [Armed Career Criminal Act]."

On April 8, 2014, the Fourth Circuit held that a defendant sentenced as a career offender before Simmons was decided, but who could not be designated a career offender after Simmons, constituted a "fundamental miscarriage of justice" that warranted equitable tolling of the statute of limitations and habeas relief. See: Whiteside v. United States, 748 F.3d 541 (4th Cir. 2014).

However, others have not been as fortunate. Federal prisoner Clyde Dial, Jr. filed a motion to vacate under 28 U.S.C. § 2255 challenging his guilty plea to two charges with an Armed Career Criminal Act enhancement, arguing that "the convictions used to apply the enhancement no longer qualify as felonies" after Simmons. He had received a 176-month prison sentence. However, as part of his plea agreement Dial waived his right to challenge his conviction or sentence under 28 U.S.C. § 2255.

The DOJ opposed Dial's motion and sought to enforce the terms of the plea agreement. The district court agreed with the government, finding in a June 18, 2014 order that Dial had knowingly waived his right to seek relief – even though he was legally innocent with respect to the ACCA enhancement. See: Dial v. United States, U.S.D.C. (E.D. NC), Case No. 7:02-cr-00090-F1; 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 83017.

The ACLU of North Carolina estimated in 2012 that more than 3,000 federal prisoners may be entitled to relief as a result of Simmons, including reduced sentences or release from prison, because they are legally innocent. In some cases, though, such innocence means little to federal prosecutors. ■

Do Faith-Based Prisons Work?

by Alexander Volokh

THERE ARE A LOT OF FAITH-BASED PRISON programs out there. As of 2005, 19 states and the federal government had some sort of residential faith-based program, aimed at rehabilitating participating prisoners by teaching them subjects like “ethical decision-making, anger management, victim restitution” and substance abuse in conjunction with religious principles.

One of them – the InnerChange Freedom Initiative program in Iowa – was struck down on Establishment Clause grounds in 2006, but various faith-based prison programs still exist, including InnerChange programs in other states. InnerChange programs, which are explicitly motivated by Christian and Biblical principles, are probably more vulnerable to constitutional challenges; programs that are more interfaith and have less explicitly religious content, like Florida’s Faith- and Character-Based Institutions or the federal Life Connections Program, are probably less so.

Faith-based prisons continue to be promoted as promising avenues for reform, chiefly on the grounds that they improve prison discipline and reduce recidivism. Unfortunately – even if we ignore the constitutional issues – most of the empirical studies of the effectiveness of faith-based prisons have serious methodological problems and, to the extent they find any positive effect of faith-based prisons, can’t be taken at face value. Those few empirical studies that approach methodological validity either fail to show that faith-based prisons reduce recidivism, or provide weak evidence in favor of them.

THE MOST SERIOUS PROBLEM WITH STUDIES of the effectiveness of faith-based prisons is the self-selection problem. Prisoners obviously choose faith-based prisons voluntarily. And the factors that would make a prisoner choose a faith-based prison may also make him less likely to commit crimes in the future. (One such factor might be religiosity itself). Also, a prisoner who takes the trouble to choose a rehabilitative program may be more motivated to change, and this may make him more likely to change.

As a result, faith-based programs might appear to have better results because its participants have lower recidivism rates – but this might have nothing to do with whether the programs actually “work.” A program with zero effect that successfully attracts better prisoners will appear to have better results – in fact, even a program that’s slightly harmful (i.e., has a negative “treatment effect”) might appear to have better results, as long as it attracts prisoners who are sufficiently better (i.e., has a positive “selection effect”). If the positive selection effect is greater than the negative treatment effect, the program might fool naïve observers into thinking it’s a success.

Therefore, what we certainly don’t want to do is just compare the results of participants in a faith-based program with those of non-participants. (Nonetheless, some studies do this!). This presents the self-selection effect in its most naked form – and the results of such a study can’t be taken seriously.

Other studies are slightly more sophisticated. They compare the group of participants with a matched group of non-participants, where non-participants are matched to participants based on various observable factors like race, age, criminal history and the like. Thus, suppose there are 100 participants and 1,000 non-participants. As stated above, we shouldn’t just compare the 100 with the 1,000 – the 100 are systematically different from the 1,000, because the 100 chose to participate and the 1,000 didn’t. The 100 have some sort of motivation that sets them apart from everyone else, even apart from any effectiveness of the program. Instead, what these studies do is take the 1,000 non-participants and identify 100 who “look like” the 100 participants – each of the 100 non-participants is as close as possible to one of the participants in race, sex, age, education and other observable factors. The hope is that comparing the 100 participants with the 100 matched non-participants will make for a more valid comparison.

Alas, this hope is probably unjustified. Even if you could perfectly match the 100 participants with 100 non-participants who looked very similar, you can only match prisoners based on observable factors like race, sex, age and so on. But one of the most important factors – motivation to change – is unobservable. So, in my view, these studies, though somewhat more sophisticated, still aren’t good enough to overcome the self-selection problem.

The third type of study uses a more sophisticated statistical technique called “propensity score” matching. Participants are matched to participants not based on observable factors directly, but based on their propensity score, that is, their estimated probability of participating in the program. But these propensity scores are generated using observable characteristics like race, sex, age, education and so on. Motivation remains unobservable, and that’s still one of the most important factors in whether a released prisoner reoffends. So propensity scores still don’t solve the self-selection problem.

So far, we’ve seen three types of studies – naïve comparisons of participants to non-participants, matching based on some observable characteristics, and matching based on propensity scores. None of these three types of studies are credible because they don’t account for self-selection. Prisoners who are motivated enough to choose to participate in a rehabilitative program are already less likely to reoffend. So any study that compares voluntary participants and voluntary non-participants may just be picking up the effect of being a good person, not the effect of the program itself. (Some of these studies are subject to even further sources of bias. For instance, in addition to self-selection in the decision whether and how intensively to participate, there can be selection by the program staff in the decision of whom to admit or whom to kick out, as well as “success bias” in the consideration only of those who completed the program without dropping out).

In my view, the only credible studies so far fall into a fourth category – those that compare (voluntary) participants in faith-based programs with people who volunteered for the program but were rejected.

Finally, a class of statistically valid studies! Unfortunately, the results from these studies generally aren’t good. In a 2003 evaluation of the Texas Inner-

Change program, there was no significant difference between how well accepted and rejected volunteers did in terms of two-year arrest or reincarceration rates. Same goes for a 2003 evaluation of the Biblical Correctives to Thinking Errors program at Indiana's Putnamville Correctional Facility, a 2004 evaluation of the Kairos Horizon Communities in Prison program at Florida's Tomoka Correctional Institution and a 2009 evaluation of Florida's dorm-based "faith and character" programs.

I've looked at two evaluations of an after-care program for ex-prisoners, the Detroit Transition of Prisoners program. This program may confer some benefits, though it's hard to say because the results aren't reported in a form that would make this easy to determine. But even if this program is successful, we still have to grapple with the "resources problem": The studies compare participation in the program either with the alternative of no program at all or with the "business as usual" alternative of whatever other programs happen to be available, rather than with participation in a comparably funded secular program.

Thus, even if a religious program is better than nothing at all, it could be because of the greater access to treatment resources (for instance, mentors and counselors) and not because of the religious content of the program.

IN THE END, THIS ARTICLE HAS BAD NEWS and good news.

The bad news, as explained above, is that most studies are low-quality and the results of the higher-quality studies aren't promising. There seems to be little empirical reason to believe that faith-based prisons work.

The good news is that there's also no proof that they don't work. The absence of statistically valid or statistically significant findings isn't the same as the presence of negative findings. And while the self-selection problem is real and important, the resources problem may not even be a problem at all: maybe the "zero alternative" or the "business as usual" alternatives really are proper empirical baselines, since they reflect both reality and, perhaps, political feasibility. So the picture isn't uniformly bleak;

there are some programs that seem to show some statistically significant effects, even if they're weak and even if we're not sure how well they compare to the hypothetical effects of a hypothetical, comparably funded secular program.

Perhaps future research will shed light on these questions. In the meantime, clearly some groups want to have faith-based prisons, some prisoners want to attend them and they probably do little if any harm. If some programs don't work, this is an indication to future practitioners that something needs to be changed; if some programs work, maybe they can be replicated elsewhere. Better results won't emerge unless they're allowed to emerge by a process of experimentation. ■

SUBSCRIPTION MADNESS 2014

Our Subscription Madness promotion has been so successful in the past that we have decided to offer it again!

PLN is offering a discount on blocks of 2 or 4 one-year subscriptions for any person not a current or former subscriber who has a US address, whether they are imprisoned or not. Subscription Madness is the only opportunity attorneys, librarians and corrections professionals have to receive a PLN subscription at a fraction of the normal rate of $90 per year, and for prisoner family members and concerned activists to subscribe at a steep discount from the normal rate of $35 per year. Prisoner subscriptions are also less than the normal $30 per year. Check out these discounts!

- $50 buys 2 one-year subscriptions ($25 each)
- $80 buys 4 one-year subscriptions ($20 each)

If you want to take advantage of Subscription Madness but are stumped for people to send them to, PLN can provide names of indigent prisoners who would love a PLN subscription. Use a separate piece of paper to order by mail, call our office to order with a credit card, or go to our website to order online. No Renewals! Sorry, but Subscription Madness is for new one-year subscriptions only, and cannot be used to renew or extend a current or former subscription. PLN is a 501(c)(3) non-profit. (Subscription Madness 2014 expires 12-31-2014).

SEC Rejects CCA, GEO Group Shareholder Resolutions to Reduce Prison Phone Rates

ON FEBRUARY 18, 2014, THE SECURITIES and Exchange Commission (SEC) granted a request filed by for-profit prison company GEO Group to exclude a shareholder resolution that sought to reduce the high cost of phone calls made by prisoners at GEO-operated facilities. Ten days later, the SEC granted a request by Corrections Corporation of America (CCA) to exclude a similar shareholder resolution.

The resolutions, filed by Alex Friedmann, managing editor of PLN and associate director of the Human Rights Defense Center (HRDC), would have required the companies to forgo “commission” kickbacks from prison phone service providers. [See: PLN, Jan. 2014, p.44]. Such kickbacks are typically based on a percentage of revenue generated from inmate telephone services (ITS) – revenue that is mostly paid by prisoners’ families.

Specifically, the shareholder resolutions stated that GEO and CCA “shall not accept ITS commissions” at their facilities, and that when the companies contract with prison phone service providers they “shall give the greatest consideration to the overall lowest ITS phone charges among the factors [they consider] when evaluating and entering into ITS contracts.” CCA and GEO both filed no-action requests with the SEC seeking to exclude the resolutions from their proxy materials.

According to its SEC filings, GEO Group received $608,108 in prison phone kickbacks in 2012. The shareholder resolution submitted to CCA noted that one of the company’s jails, the Silverdale Detention Facility in Chattanooga, Tennessee, received a commission of 48% of prison phone revenue, and that a 15-minute call from that facility cost as much as $9.75.

On February 11, 2014, a Federal Communications Commission (FCC) order went into effect that caps the cost of long distance prison phone calls nationwide at $.25 per minute for collect calls and $.21 per minute for debit and prepaid calls. The order does not apply to intrastate (in-state) prison phone rates, however, which remain high at many correctional facilities. [See: PLN, Feb. 2014, p.10; Dec. 2013, p.1].

Research has consistently found that prisoners who maintain close connections with their families while incarcerated have better post-release outcomes and lower recidivism rates. As stated by FCC Commissioner Mignon Clyburn: “Studies have shown that having meaningful contact beyond prison walls can make a real difference in maintaining community ties, promoting rehabilitation, and reducing recidivism. Making these calls more affordable can facilitate all of these objectives and more.” [See: PLN, April 2014, p.24].

GEO Group objected to the shareholder resolution by arguing that Friedmann had a “personal grievance” or would personally benefit from reducing prison phone rates at the company’s facilities; that the resolution did not address an issue significantly related to the company’s business; that it lacked the power or authority to implement the resolution; that the proposal concerned GEO’s ordinary business operations; and that the resolution constituted “multiple proposals.”

“GEO Group basically threw the kitchen sink at the resolution seeking to exclude it, and was ultimately successful,” said Friedmann. “This is what happens when essential public safety and criminal justice services, such as operating prisons, are contracted out to a private corporation without a conscience that is only interested in making money.”

He added, “Make no mistake, when GEO claims it is interested in rehabilitating offenders, as it does on its website, it is merely providing lip-service. GEO Group had an opportunity to make a real difference in terms of increasing the ability of prisoners to stay in touch with their families, which would benefit our communities through lower recidivism rates and thus less crime and victimization. Instead, the company protected its profits from prison phone kickbacks.”

Similarly, with respect to CCA, Friedmann said: “The company claims that it’s interested in rehabilitating offenders, but when faced with a resolution that would have reduced phone rates at its for-profit facilities, thereby having a rehabilitative effect on prisoners and resulting in less recidivism, CCA decided its profits from prison phone kickbacks were more important. Which demonstrates that despite its corporate PR rhetoric, CCA cares little about rehabilitation or public safety.”

Friedmann was ably represented before the SEC by attorneys Jeffrey Lowenthal and Jon Burke with the New York-based law firm of Stroock, Stroock & Lavan. ■

Seventh Circuit: No Qualified Immunity for Diabetic Detainee’s Death

by Mark Wilson

ON AUGUST 20, 2013, THE SEVENTH Circuit affirmed a district court’s denial of qualified immunity in a case concerning an Illinois pretrial detainee’s death due to medical neglect.

Phillip Okoro, 23, was arrested for a misdemeanor property offense in October 2008 and held at the Williamson County Jail. Although Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975) requires a probable cause hearing to be held within 48 hours, Okoro was incarcerated for 69 days without such a hearing.

As a teenager, Okoro was diagnosed with Type I diabetes, which he controlled by carefully monitoring his blood sugar levels. In college, however, Okoro’s health deteriorated when he suffered from schizophrenia and stopped monitoring his diabetes.

Williamson County contracts with Health Professionals, Ltd. (HPL) to provide medical care at the county jail. Immediately after his arrest, Okoro’s family alerted jail and medical staff about his mental illness and diabetes.

While incarcerated, Okoro was confined in an isolation cell under the care of HPL employees Dr. Jogendra Chhabra and Nurse Marilyn Ann Reynolds. He was dependent on jail and medical staff to monitor his blood sugar levels, provide insulin shots and deliver other necessary medical treatment.

On December 23, 2008, Okoro collapsed in his cell and died from diabetic ketoacidosis, a buildup of acidic ketones in the bloodstream that occurs when the body runs out of insulin.

Okoro's sister, Jaclyn Currie, filed a federal lawsuit against jail officials, HPL, Dr. Chhabra, Nurse Reynolds and others. She alleged the defendants were deliberately indifferent to Okoro's medical needs and his death was "completely preventable" with adequate medical care, regular blood sugar monitoring and sufficient insulin.

Currie initially claimed violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. "At the close of discovery, however, in response to the defendants' motion for summary judgment, Currie argued for the first time that the Fourth Amendment's 'objectively unreasonable' standard should govern," since Okoro was a pretrial detainee. The district court granted Currie leave to amend her complaint to allege a Fourth Amendment violation.

Shortly after that ruling the county and jail officials settled with Currie, leaving HPL and its employees, Chhabra and Reynolds, as the only remaining defendants.

The HPL defendants then moved to dismiss, claiming they were entitled to qualified immunity because the Fourth Amendment has not been applied to medical professional subcontractors. When the district court denied their motion, Chhabra and Reynolds filed an interlocutory appeal.

"A jailer might violate an arrestee's Fourth Amendment rights by unreasonably denying the arrestee access to insulin," they argued, "but a health care professional who unreasonably withholds insulin does not."

The Seventh Circuit found their argument lacked "support in law or logic," noting that "from the perspective of the arrestee, it matters not a whit whether it is the jailer or the doctor whose conduct deprives him of life-saving medical care."

Following the Sixth Circuit's reasoning in McCullum v. Tepe, 693 F.3d 696 (6th Cir. 2012), the appellate court found "the contours of Okoro's Fourth Amendment rights were 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right' throughout the period of Okoro's detention."

The Court of Appeals also rejected the defendants' argument that they were entitled to qualified immunity because they were unaware of Okoro's legal status as a pretrial detainee.

Such an argument "assumes that health care providers calibrate the level of medical care they provide to a jail inmate based on their assessment of the inmate's legal status, taking advantage of the right to be sloppy where the standard is lower," the Seventh Circuit observed. "We sincerely hope that this is not how Chhabra, Reynolds, and Health Professionals, Ltd. go about caring for those in the State's custody." The appellate court concluded that "if the defendants truly tailor their care (or lack thereof) in this fashion, then their failure to ascertain Okoro's correct status cannot be characterized as a 'reasonable' mistake, and their qualified immunity claim still fails." See: Currie v. Chhabra, 728 F.3d 626 (7th Cir. 2013).

Following remand, Dr. Chhabra agreed to settle the case in December 2013 for $775,000, resolving claims related to the remaining HPL defendants. Okoro's sister was represented by the Chicago law firm of Loevy & Loevy. ■

Update on PLN Suit Against Nevada DOC

PRISON LEGAL NEWS CONTINUES ITS efforts to defend its First Amendment right to communicate with prisoners in the Nevada Department of Corrections (NDOC). In 1999 the NDOC banned all copies of PLN, claiming the publication constituted "inmate correspondence." PLN filed suit and was granted a preliminary injunction requiring delivery of PLN subscriptions and mail to Nevada prisoners. The state entered into a consent decree in September 2000, agreeing that prisoners "shall be permitted to subscribe to the publications of their choice," subject only to specified security concerns.

However, ongoing censorship of PLN's monthly magazine and books resulted in a June 2013 lawsuit in which PLN seeks to enjoin the unconstitutional censorship of its publications by prison officials. [See: PLN, Nov. 2013, p.18]. In conjunction with the lawsuit, PLN also filed a motion for an order to show cause in the prior suit, seeking to hold the NDOC in contempt for violating provisions of the 2000 consent decree by enacting and enforcing policies that continue to censor PLN's monthly publication and book orders sent to Nevada prisoners. The federal district court later consolidated the two cases.

On June 17,

2014, the NDOC filed a motion to dismiss PLN's suit, claiming a revised mail policy (AR 750) resolved any constitutional issues with the old mail policy. The court has not yet ruled on the motion; a jury trial in the case is scheduled for January 27, 2015. See: PLN v. Cox, U.S.D.C. (D. Nev.), Case No. 3:00-cv-00373-HDM-WGC.

PLN relies on information we receive from prisoners to assist us in our litigation, and we invite Nevada readers to contact us concerning censorship of mail and books at NDOC facilities. Specifically, whether prisoners receive notice when mail is withheld or censored, whether they have participated in an appeals process, and if they are receiving book orders without "pre-approval." Nevada prisoners can contact us in these regards at: Prison Legal News, Attn: NV DOC Suit, P.O. Box 1151, Lake Worth, FL 33460. ■

Flimsy Reasons for Prolonged, Frequent Lockdowns State Eighth Amendment Claim

by David Reutter

THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS has held that an Illinois prisoner's complaint that frequent lockdowns for substantial periods of time deprived him of exercise and caused him various health problems stated an Eighth Amendment claim. However, the Court found that he failed to state a due process claim concerning the loss of his monthly stipend due to the lockdowns.

The appellate ruling followed a district court's dismissal, under 28 U.S.C § 1915A, of a civil rights complaint filed by Menard Correctional Center (MCC) prisoner Gregory J. Turley. The dismissal addressed Turley's Eighth Amendment claims but not his Fourteenth Amendment claim.

The Seventh Circuit determined that Turley had exhausted his administrative remedies and had brought his action in a timely manner, noting that Illinois has a "two-year statute of limitations, which is tolled while the prisoner exhausts the administrative grievance process." As he was not procedurally barred, the Court of Appeals turned to the merits of the case.

Turley, serving a life sentence, was classified as a "low-aggression offender" and housed in a unit of similarly classified prisoners. Between January 7, 2008 and October 4, 2010, there were 25 lockdowns imposed at the MCC. The longest lasted 81 days and there were 534 total lockdown days, which amounted to lockdown status for "more than 50% of the period in question."

The lockdowns, Turley argued, were "often imposed for non-penologically-related purposes, such as isolated fights between two inmates from other cellhouses, rumors of a potential fight or for no reason at all." He further contended "the excessive use of lockdowns arose out of a conspiracy among prison officials and union employees to create a staff shortage and negotiate a pay raise."

Additionally, he alleged "a conspiracy to exaggerate prison response to minor incidents, or no incidents at all, in order to allow staff to take vacation and/or to psychologically punish all prisoners for the misconduct of a few." Finally, he claimed the lockdown periods resulted in his $10 monthly idle pay stipend to be withheld, depriving him of due process.

The Seventh Circuit initially found the district court had wrongly concluded that Turley failed to list the specific periods of lockdown confinement at issue. It then rejected the state's reliance on a lockdown case involving a single prisoner, Pearson v. Ramos, 237 F.3d 881 (7th Cir. 2001) [PLN, Oct. 2001, p.18]. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the notion of "an ironclad rule that a denial of yard privileges shorter than 90 consecutive days cannot be the basis for an Eighth Amendment claim."

Rather, the Court of Appeals wrote it had previously explained the "norm of proportionality" should be applied in such cases, and that a lockdown not exceeding 90 days could violate the norm if it were "imposed ... for some utterly trivial infraction of the prison's disciplinary rules."

In this case, the Court said it was "confronted with a pattern of prison-wide lockdowns, which Turley alleges occurred for flimsy reasons or no reason at all." He alleged serious injuries resulting from the inability to exercise outside or in his small cell, in the form of "irritable bowel syndrome, severe stress, headaches, and tinnitus."

While the appellate court held that prison officials were made aware of Turley's Eighth Amendment claims through his grievances and prior lawsuits by other MCC prisoners, it found he had a post-deprivation remedy for the stipend claim through the Illinois Court of Claims, thus his due process claim failed. The district court's judgment was reversed in part as to Turley's Eighth Amendment claims and affirmed as to his due process claim, and the case remains pending on remand. See: Turley v. Rednour, 729 F.3d 645 (7th Cir. 2013). ■

Illinois $50 State's Attorney Fee Applies Only to Habeas Proceedings

by Mark Wilson

THE ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT HELD in September 2013 that a $50 State's Attorney fee authorized in habeas corpus cases does not apply to non-habeas collateral proceedings.

After an Illinois trial court dismissed a post-conviction petition filed by state prisoner Omar Johnson, he submitted a petition for relief from judgment under section 2-1401 of the Illinois Code of Civil Procedure.

The state moved to dismiss the petition and requested that Johnson be assessed filing fees and court costs under section 22-105(a) of the Code of Civil Procedure, for filing a frivolous petition.

The trial court granted the state's motion to dismiss and assessed fees and costs against Johnson, including a $50 State's Attorney fee pursuant to section 4-2002.1(a) of the Counties Code, which authorizes the fee in habeas corpus cases. Johnson appealed, lost in the appellate court and the Illinois Supreme Court granted review.

The Supreme Court interpreted section 4-2002.1(a) to determine whether the legislature had intended the fee to extend beyond habeas cases to all collateral proceedings.

"Giving the term 'habeas corpus' ... its plain and ordinary meaning," the Court concluded the fee "only applies to the various types of habeas corpus proceedings." The Court held that "collateral proceedings such as a section 2-1401 petition and a post-conviction petition" are not habeas proceedings, and the legislature did not intend for the fee to "apply 'generically' to all collateral proceedings."

As such, the state Supreme Court reversed in part the judgment of the trial and appellate courts, and remanded with instructions to vacate the $50 State's Attorney fee. See: People v. Johnson, 2013 IL 114639, 995 N.E.2d 986 (Ill. 2013).

Although a legal victory, the ruling may be small consolation for Johnson, who is serving natural life plus at least 60 years. ■

News in Brief

Arizona: A prisoner serving time for gang- and drug-related offenses, as well as his attorney-wife, mother, sister, ex-wife and another woman have been indicted on more than 250 charges following a two-year investigation into the New Mexican Mafia prison gang. Angel Lopez Garcia is accused of being a gang leader who has, since at least 2007, directed drug sales, extortion, money laundering and gang violence from behind bars with assistance from the women named as co-defendants. His wife, Phoenix criminal defense attorney Carmen Fischer, and the four other women accused in the conspiracy, Rosio Robles Gonzales, Oralia L. Garcia, Tanya Garcia-Ochoa and Rosemary Ann Garcia, were arrested on October 4, 2013. Fischer pleaded guilty on March 31, 2014 and was sentenced to three years in prison.

Arkansas: St. Francis County deputies have filed a number of new charges against Jonathan Paulman, 22, who was in jail for burglary when he set fire to his cell on October 15, 2013. Paulman told jail officials that he had started the fire as a way to get out to attend his young son's birthday party. He used a contraband cigarette lighter to torch a mattress, towel and laundry bag in the cell he shared with four other prisoners. Paulman told deputies that he planned to blame the arson on someone else. No one was injured in the blaze.

California: A licensed bail agent in Modesto was arrested on November 26, 2013 on various charges related to his soliciting gang members at the Stanislaus County Jail to carry out violent crimes, including murder. Praveen Singh, who is also known as "Prajeer Singh," was arrested following a lengthy joint investigation by the Modesto, Turlock and Ceres Police Departments, Stanislaus County Sheriff's Department and Stanislaus County District Attorney's Office.

Colorado: Former deputy Matthew Andrews initially pleaded not guilty to helping prisoner Felix Trujillo escape from the downtown Denver Detention Center. [See: PLN, Nov. 2013, p.56]. On November 22, 2013, however, he pleaded guilty to a felony charge of attempting to influence a public servant. "What you did is not only a dishonor to yourself but the whole sheriff's department," the judge told Andrews when he sentenced him on January 24, 2014 to the maximum six years in prison.

Delaware: State police announced on November 20, 2013 that Christopher Peck, a guard at the Sussex Correctional Institution, had been arrested and charged with sexual misconduct. Peck, 39, faces 11 counts of sexual relations in a detention facility. A 19-year-old prisoner reported that she had sex with Peck, and in the course of the investigation police learned that two other prisoners, aged 27 and 28, had also been victimized by the guard. Peck entered a guilty plea to six of the charges and was sentenced to three years in prison on June 6, 2014.

District of Columbia: Trey Radel – now known as the "Cocaine Congressman" – voted to allow states to drug test food stamp recipients. It turns out that he should have been the one tested for drugs. Radel pleaded guilty to buying cocaine in an FBI and DEA sting operation, and was sentenced in November 2013 to one year of probation and residential substance abuse treatment. According to the Associated Press, Radel's guilty plea to the misdemeanor drug possession charge was the first by a sitting congressman in 31 years. Radel is fortunate to have been sentenced in D.C., where a special drug court handles certain drug offense cases.

Florida: Two Orange County jail guards were fired on October 11, 2013 after fighting on a charter bus while headed home from a charity event. Michael Dean and Donald Casey had been drinking when Dean thought Casey made comments about his girlfriend, also a jail guard. Investigators said Dean initiated the fight by throwing a punch, and afterward Casey threatened to stab him. The bus driver said all of the jail employees were "very drunk and very rude," and had trashed the bus. Dean was reinstated to his job in January 2014 but demoted.

Florida: Alexander Lansky, a property clerk at the Pinellas County Jail, admitted to having an addiction to prescription pills when detectives interviewed him following complaints from two prisoners who said their legally-prescribed painkillers were missing from their property when they were released from jail. The sheriff's office accused Lansky of stealing Vicodin, Percocet and morphine pills from five prisoners, and he was charged with five counts of grand theft and five counts of possession of prescription drugs on October 22, 2013.

Idaho: The Idaho Department of Correction announced on November 13, 2013 that it was suspending visitation for all prisoners in Unit 2 at the Pocatello Women's Correctional Center after a prisoner tested positive for hepatitis A. Prison staff also suspended all prisoner transfers into and out of the facility while health care providers watched for more possible cases. Unit 2 prisoners were scheduled to receive hepatitis A vaccine and immune globulin as a precaution.

Illinois: Former Wills County courthouse bailiff Jerome W. Henry was sentenced in August 2013 to three years in prison for possession of child porn. On November 14, 2013, Judge Sarah Jones granted his motion to reconsider and resented him to 147 days in jail, three years' probation, 130 hours of public service and $2,999 in fines and costs. The 130 hours of public service was later waived. Henry, 63, is registered as a sexual predator in the state's online sex offender database.

Illinois: On November 26, 2013, Illinois DOC spokesman Tom Shaer said officials at the minimum-security Taylorville Correctional Center were trying to control an outbreak of a skin rash, with at least 17 prisoners reporting symptoms of intense itching. One prisoner was diagnosed as having scabies. One wing of a housing unit was placed on quarantine, and prisoners showing signs of the rash were isolated before being returned to a special quarantine room.

Iran: Reza Heydarpour, arrested by the Ministry of Intelligence on November 4, 2013, has not been heard from since being transferred to Evin Prison. Heydarpour was the physician who completed a report on the death of Internet blogger Sattar Beheshti, who died at Evin Prison in October 2012. Beheshti's death was reported by many as the result of severe beatings and torture following his arrest for his online activities. In 2009, another Iranian prison physician, Ramin Pourandarjani, died under suspicious circumstances.

Libya: A Libyan security official who spoke with the Associated Press on condition of anonymity said unknown gunmen had attacked the prison in Sabha on November 29, 2013 and succeeded in releasing 40 prisoners. The gunmen helped the prisoners escape by opening fire and threatening the guards; prison director Shaaban Nasr said scores of escapees later surrendered.

Montana: Former prison nurse Tisha Ann Brunell, 45, was facing 53 charges for engaging in sexual misconduct with a prisoner. [See: PLN, Sept. 2013, p.17]. A jury trial was held on March 22, 2014 and Brunell was found guilty of 48 of the charges. After she is sentenced, she faces another trial for trying to threaten a witness while she was out on bond.

New York: On November 7, 2013, prisoner Armando Ortiz was subjected to a random frisk search at the Marcy Correctional Facility and guards found a handmade sharp instrument attached to his prosthetic leg. A local prosthetics company called in to disassemble the leg found four more razor weapons and a small amount of Suboxone. Ortiz, who was serving 1½ to 3 years for attempted felony assault, faced disciplinary charges but no new criminal charges were filed.

North Carolina: Matthew Ethelbert Toney was fired and charged with a felony on November 22, 2013. Toney, a Durham County sheriff's jailer since 1996, is accused of engaging in sexual activity with a prisoner; he posted a $30,000 bond following his arrest and was released.

Ohio: James Miracle was fired from his job at the Mansfield Correctional Institution on November 22, 2013. As a building construction supervisor at the prison he was required to properly supervise tools that were used during the July 2013 escape of prisoner James David Myers. Myers, who was serving a life sentence, used a pickax to break into a storage area to get three ladders, which he then used to climb over security fences. He was captured one day later by customers at a convenience store. Miracle also was accused of falsifying forms and forging signatures on maintenance inventories, which "compromised or undermined the security of the institution."

Oklahoma: A former guard at the Corrections Corporation of America-operated Cimarron Correctional Facility was charged in November 2013 with bringing contraband into the prison. Alyson Frances Posey was approached by prisoner Reeco Cole, who told her that the father of one of her children, who was incarcerated at another prison, owed him money. She agreed to bring tobacco into the facility to pay off the debt, then began smuggling other contraband for cash payments. She also gave nude photos of herself to Cole. Investigators said Cole denied having any relationship with Posey.

Oklahoma: On November 23, 2013, Mayes County jailer Aaron Peters appeared in court to enter a not guilty plea to a charge of rape by instrumentation. Peters, 23, was assigned to supervise a female prisoner during her stay at a hospital. He allegedly entered the bathroom where the prisoner was showering and performed sexual acts on her; she subsequently passed out from the medication she was taking, and awoke to find Peters engaging in sex acts with her. The prisoner's complaint interview was conducted while she was wearing Peters' shirt; she had also stolen his handcuff key.

Oklahoma: The Associated Press reported on November 23, 2013 that seven state prisoners were hospitalized over a three-week period with symptoms of salmonella poisoning. Nearly 100 prisoners at the Eddie Warrior, Jim E. Hamilton, Joseph Harp and Bill Johnson correctional centers reported symptoms. Department of Corrections spokesman Jerry Massie said it was uncommon for so many prisoners to fall ill at different facilities. The state Department of Health is investigating the source of the outbreak.

Pennsylvania: After a traffic stop on November 11, 2013, John Vincent was arrested on an outstanding warrant. When he was booked into the Northampton County Prison, a strip search revealed that he had attached 18 packets of heroin to his penis with a rubber band. Vincent was charged with possession of drug paraphernalia, possession of heroin and providing false identification to a law enforcement officer. His bail was set at $50,000.

Pennsylvania: Six members of the group Citizens for Social Justice were told by Delaware County officials that they did not need a permit to peacefully protest across from the George W. Hill Correctional Facility. When the group gathered on November 5, 2013 at the Community Education Centers-operated prison to highlight issues of abuse and improper releases, they were met by a large show of force and told to move more than a mile away. "They had about 20 guards, K-9s, county police; it looked like a whole Gestapo troop," said Pastor Keith Collins, one of the protest organizers. Collins said the group would like to meet with both CEC and the County Prison Board, and encourages the formation of a citizen advisory board to enhance accountability at the prison.

Texas: On October 31, 2013, fourteen former workers from the McConnell Unit were sentenced in federal court on racketeering and drug charges. Eleven other people also were convicted for their roles in the scheme. The large-scale criminal enterprise was uncovered when the Texas Department of Criminal Justice and federal agencies began investigating the McConnell Unit in 2009. The Aryan Circle and Mexican cartels were involved in the scheme, which included organizing drug deals outside the prison.

Texas: Among other responsibilities, former Winkler County Attorney Steve Taliaferro prosecuted misdemeanor cases. He resigned from his position and pleaded guilty on November 6, 2013 to solicitation of prostitution and official oppression. Taliaferro was audio-recorded propositioning a woman and telling her he would settle her case if she consented to having sex with him. Under the terms of his plea agreement, Taliaferro was ordered to serve 45 days in the Winkler County Jail.

Texas: On November 6, 2013, an East Texas parole officer pleaded guilty and was sentenced to 42 months in federal prison for using his state computer to view child pornography. Barry Porter Griffith was arrested after Texas Department of Criminal Justice computer engineers detected an unusual amount of bandwidth being accessed by a system in Griffith's office. Officials were able to remotely view the websites he was visiting and discovered the presence of child porn. Griffith also surrendered two personal computers that contained child pornography.

United Kingdom: The Ministry of Justice was fined £140,000 on October 22, 2013 after it emailed confidential personal information about HMP Cardiff's 1,182 prisoners to families of other prisoners. A spreadsheet containing names, addresses, offense details, sentence length, ethnicity and release dates was mistakenly sent to three families, according to the Information Commissioner's Office. "The potential damage and distress that could have been caused by this serious data breach is obvious," said Director of Data Protection David Smith.

Utah: Former Salt Lake City Judge Virginia Ward, who had presided over countless misdemeanor drug cases, was sentenced on November 19, 2013 to 90 days in jail and three years of probation after pleading guilty to possession of Oxycodone with intent to distribute. Although Ward had initially faced up to 15 years in prison, her attorney said the sentence was “disappointingly harsh.” Courtroom observers thought differently; one man reportedly commented “slap on the wrist,” while another said, “I would have gotten the same sentence for a speeding ticket.”

Virginia: Sometime between September and November 2012, former federal prison guard Jeffery T. Jones accepted bribes of at least $1,500 to smuggle over a quarter pound of marijuana and at least 10 cartons of cigarettes into FCC Petersburg. He pleaded guilty to receiving bribes and providing contraband on November 12, 2013. Two prisoners at the facility, Alvin Dewayne Hall and Patrick Gregory, also pleaded guilty to charges in connection with the smuggling scheme.

Virginia: Following an internal affairs investigation, a former Henrico County Sheriff’s Deputy was arrested on November 21, 2013 and charged with three felony counts of carnal knowledge of an inmate by an employee. Jennifer Ann Baran, 33, resigned from the sheriff’s department in May 2012, when the investigation began.

She is accused of having a sexual relationship with a prisoner at Henrico Jail West; the prisoner, who was not identified, was discovered with a cell phone that he then flushed down a toilet. A search of his cell revealed 25 handwritten love letters from Baran.

Virginia: Samah Yellardy died at the Powhatan Correctional Center on November 7, 2013. The prison did not notify his mother, who learned of her son’s death through posts from other prisoners’ families on Facebook. Janice Yellardy said several prisoners and even a guard who was on duty at the time her son died had contacted the family. “My son complained about his side, not his heart. It ain’t right. The warden told me he had a massive heart attack and I said no sir, my son did not have a heart attack. My son was 29 years old and had no medical problems.” She added, “They messed with the wrong one. If I have to fight until the day I die, I’m going to get justice for my son.”

Washington: On November 21, 2013, Sean Wright, 34, was charged with felony first-degree custodial sexual misconduct. The Snohomish County jail guard is accused of forcing a female prisoner to perform a sex act on him inside a broom closet. The incident was discovered during an unrelated investigation that found Wright had let several other women have time out of their cells or other privileges if they allowed him to watch them shower or change clothes.

Washington: Facing embezzlement and possible harassment charges, a 16-year veteran jail guard, Sgt. Bruce Benscoter, resigned on September 30, 2013 after being on paid leave for several months. Benscoter, 43, was the subject of separate investigations into improper financial dealings as a director of the Wapato Youth Athletics League and for improper sexual conduct with a former prisoner while on duty at the Wapato City Jail. Benscoter allegedly threatened two prisoners who cooperated in an internal investigation into the sexual misconduct allegations. He was charged in the embezzlement case with second-degree theft and misappropriation and falsification of accounts by a public officer.

West Virginia: Jason Noel Squires, a former federal prison guard, and his girlfriend, Nikole Monique Watkins, were both sentenced on November 25, 2013. Squires and Watkins raked in approximately $40,000 in cash payments from prisoners’ family members for tobacco that Squires smuggled into FCI Gilmer. Squires, 28, was sentenced to 18 months in prison and two years of supervised release, while Watkins, 24, received 12 months in prison and two years of supervised release.

Wisconsin: On October 22, 2013, criminal complaints were released by Racine County prosecutors that detailed allegations of sexual misconduct by two health care workers at the Racine Correctional Institution. Lisa M. Hawkins, 33, and Karina Herrera, 40, were both charged with felony sexual assault by correctional staff; Hawkins faces an additional charge of obstructing an officer and Herrera faces another felony count of delivering illegal items to an inmate. The women are accused of performing sex acts on the same prisoner at different times in the bathroom of the Health Services Unit at the facility. Because Hawkins worked for a private medical contractor, her defense attorneys argued she was not a DOC employee and thus did not meet the definition of "correctional staff." Prosecutors disagreed, saying the statute also applies to contractors.

Wisconsin: The Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission released data in November 2013 that indicated a prison guard union had failed to reach the required number of member votes to remain certified. Collective bargaining restrictions instituted by Governor Scott Walker require members of public employee unions to vote annually on whether they want the organization to continue to represent them. A union representing about 7,000 prison guards failed to meet the 51% majority vote needed to retain its certification.

Unfair Punishment

by Sam Levin

Part One: Victim Discrimination

A state program that's supposed to help crime victims denies people who have had run-ins with the law or are afraid of being victimized again.

THE FRONT DOOR WAS WIDE OPEN WHEN police arrived at the home of Samantha Rogers at 3:21 a.m. on February 23, 2010. Inside the Stockton, California apartment, Rogers was alone, sitting on the kitchen table, wiping her face with a towel. The television was overturned and there was blood smeared across the living room carpet and walls.

Rogers didn't think she needed to go to the hospital. "I was like, 'There's nothing wrong with me. I'm okay,'" Rogers, now 46, recalled. "They could see I was in shock."

Rogers was not okay. Her whole face was swollen, she had a large cut under her eye and her nose was broken, according to a Stockton Police Department report and Rogers' own recollection of the incident. Earlier that night, she and her boyfriend of three years had invited friends over to play cards and dominoes at their shared home. At one point, the couple got in an argument about money, and Rogers' boyfriend started getting violent. The guests "decided to leave before things escalated," the police report stated. On their way out, the friends could hear Rogers screaming for help, but they did not call police. Eventually, a neighbor did. By then, Rogers' boyfriend had dragged her on the floor and punched and kicked her in the face and head multiple times, the report said.

When cops arrived, the boyfriend was already gone – and he had taken her wallet and credit card with him.

Police immediately called in medics, who tried to convince Rogers that she needed to go to the emergency room. "They were like, 'Ms. Rogers, you don't understand how bad you're messed up. We can see, because we're looking at you,'" she recalled. Finally, they found a pocket mirror in her bedroom and handed it to her.

"I just started crying," she said. "My face was unrecognizable."

At St. Joseph's Medical Center, doctors told her she needed five sets of stitches, but that was not the only bad news she received. Soon after, she learned that the California Victim Compensation Program, which provides financial assistance to victims of violence, would not give her a dime of support. At the time, Rogers was on felony parole, which automatically disqualified her from receiving any aid from the state. She had been released from state prison a year earlier after more than seventeen years in and out of the criminal justice system for a range of nonviolent, victimless crimes, mostly tied to drug offenses and her battle with substance abuse. Rogers said that when she was attacked in 2010, she still had roughly eight more months left on parole. That meant the state would not help her with one of her most pressing needs – moving away from her home in Stockton where her ex-boyfriend could find her.

Just a few weeks after Rogers went to the hospital, an official from the San Joaquin County District Attorney's Office informed her of the state's Victim Compensation rules. "They said there's nothing they could possibly do to help me in any way," she said. "I had to keep my cool. But in actuality I was outraged. I was like, fucking for real? Parole is stopping me from getting the support I need? Just because I'm on parole or ... had something to do with another crime that makes me less qualified to get help?"

"That makes me feel like I'm less human," Rogers continued, noting that finding a new place to live away from her violent ex-boyfriend was critical to her safety. "I feared that if he came back, he might want to finish me off."

Over the past year, Victim Compensation, a state program that reimburses victims for a range of expenses like hospital bills, relocation and mental health services, has come under increased scrutiny for its discriminatory practices. In December 2013, critics won a victory when the board that oversees the program voted to allow sex workers to access aid; the now-defunct regulation had stated that a victim's involvement in "prostitution" leading up to the act of violence barred her or him from receiving compensation. A sex worker who spoke out about being brutally attacked and then subsequently denied aid sparked the debate. While social justice advocates celebrated that change – which is still in the process of being finalized and implemented – other activists, especially prisoners' rights groups, continue to lament the other inequities written into state law. Namely, formerly incarcerated people who become victims of violence are barred from receiving any financial assistance while on felony parole and probation. And in California, that includes people convicted of nonviolent drug offenses.

It's not uncommon for low-income people who get caught up in the criminal justice system to become victims of violence themselves. In this way, the program's exclusion of people with criminal records punishes some of the most vulnerable victims – those struggling to rehabilitate their lives after incarceration and who already have little to no support. They often can't find a safe place to live, a steady job, or enough money to survive. In these challenging circumstances, people reentering society can get caught up in gun violence and abusive relationships. And when they do, the state's denial of aid can send them on a downward spiral and, advocates argue, revictimize them.

But this isn't the only group that the program refuses to help. The state also generally rejects applicants who don't cooperate with police, which can be an obstacle for victims of domestic violence who are trapped in dangerous situations and afraid to talk with cops. And for victims caught up in gang activity, cooperating with law enforcement can be fatal – in some cases even exposing family members and friends to retaliation and violence. Program officials say they consider these kinds of risks, but advocates say unfair denials due to lack of cooperation are common. And as these victims work to protect themselves and their loved ones, the lack of basic financial aid can dramatically hinder their ability to recover from a violent episode.

Critics of the program, which is primarily supported by fines criminal offenders are ordered to pay when they are convicted, also argue that the state has more than enough cash to aid victims it currently excludes: In fiscal year 2012-13, California officials reported a program fund "reserve" of nearly $80 million.

"The fact that categories of people are barred from any type of compensation exposes such deep problems with the way in which the fund is administered," said Diana Block, an advisory board member of the California Coalition for Women Prisoners.

Rogers today still struggles to understand why a victimless, nonviolent crime in her past – one for which she already served time behind bars – prevented her from getting the basic help she needed. "You keep saying you want me to get rehabilitated.... But where do we get some healing?"

AS A VICTIM OF DOMESTIC VIOLENCE WITH medical bills, a damaged home and a perpetrator on the loose, Rogers was just the kind of candidate the state is supposed to help. When it was formed in 1965, the Victim Compensation Program was the first of its kind in the nation solely dedicated to providing financial aid to those who have faced violence. The program is a "provider of last resort," explained Jon Myers, deputy executive officer of public affairs and outreach for the Victim Compensation and Government Claims Board. "We help victims who really don't have anywhere else to turn to." That means the state program can help with crime-related expenses not covered by other sources, such as private insurance or Medi-Cal. (It can cover co-pays, for example).

The program supports victims of domestic violence, child abuse, sexual assault, drunk driving accidents, robbery and hate crimes, among others. It also offers aid to the families of homicide victims and people legally dependent on victims for financial support. (It does not support victims of nonviolent offenses, like financial crimes). Victim Compensation can help with a wide range of expenses, including medical and dental treatment, mental health services, income loss, funeral and burial expenses, home security, relocation and crime-scene cleanup. "We see it as a big relief to victims in helping them overcome the trauma of a violent crime," said Myers, noting that expenses can quickly add up and overwhelm victims.

In fiscal year 2012-13, the state approved 41,470 claims, representing 78 percent of the total applications it received, said Anne Gordon, spokesperson for Victim Compensation. The state denied 11,649 people – 22 percent of total applications. (Those figures do not factor in whether a denied claim was appealed and subsequently approved). On average, the board receives two hundred applications per workday and approves 40,000 to 50,000 per year. In fiscal year 2012-13, the program paid nearly $62 million to victims in total, which averages about $1,500 per approved applicant.

“That’s a lot of services and a lot of people that we are helping,” Myers said. Since its inception, the program has provided victims with more than $2.2 billion in total assistance.

Victims can apply through county Victim Witness Assistance Centers or through the state, and generally must do so within three years of the crime being committed. The state sets financial limits for different categories, such as a $63,000 cap on medical reimbursements and a $5,000 maximum for funeral and burial costs.

There are also a series of factors that render an applicant ineligible. In general, people who “knowingly and willingly participated in or were involved in the events leading to the crime” and victims who do not cooperate with law enforcement don’t qualify for any reimbursements.

Furthermore, as was the case with Rogers, a person who is convicted of a felony may not be granted compensation until that person has been discharged from probation or parole. Probation is administered by counties and parole is run by the state and involves people convicted of felonies released from prison. Gordon said that individuals on felony probation or parole are not automatically denied and that their claims can gain initial approval, but they cannot collect any assistance until they are off probation or parole. And even at that time, expenses incurred while on probation and parole can’t be retroactively covered.

In short, the program is inaccessible to people recently convicted of felonies. In California, that’s a large group. As of January 2014, the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation had 47,525 parolees assigned to its adult parole operations division. The length of probation differs by county. In Alameda County, the standard period for felonies is five years, and the county probation department supervises approximately 13,000 people at a given time. A majority of them have been convicted of felonies. There are 58 counties in the state. And there are hundreds of non-serious, low-level offenses that are classified as felonies.

“Simply put, it’s just not fair,” said Alameda County Public Defender Brendon Woods. “I don’t honestly understand the rationale as to why the victim of a crime who is on probation or parole is not entitled to the same compensation as someone who’s not.”

The policy “uniquely disadvantages people from underserved communities,” added Kimberly Horiuchi, an attorney with the ACLU of Northern California, arguing that it’s wrong for the state to make judgments about who is worthy and who is not. “Victims are victims. Rape is rape.”

Gordon said her office has no data on the number of felony parolees and probationers who seek compensation. She said the most common reasons for denial include an incomplete application, a submission outside of the required filing period or from someone out-of-state, a request from a victim of a non-violent crime, and an applicant having participated in the crime or refused to cooperate with police.

But some victims may not even fill out an application once they learn the program is not available to them. “They already know the door is slammed in their face,” said Ida McCray, director of Families With A Future, an organization affiliated with the San Francisco-based nonprofit Legal Services for Prisoners with Children. “We get the message. It’s ‘we don’t give a fuck about y’all.’ We are used to the wounds.”

The policy limiting this fund to a certain class of people also serves to reinforce deep prejudices against those with criminal records. “It perpetuates the lie that someone’s humanity ends once they get a conviction,” said Eliza Hersh, director of the Clean Slate Practice at the East Bay Community Law Center. "People who suffer are people who suffer regardless of their supervision status or past mistakes."

For those rejected, a denial is not simply a financial inconvenience. Rogers, who is now a program assistant for the California Coalition for Women Prisoners, which is based in San Francisco, was unable to find a new place to live after her boyfriend beat her savagely in 2010. Even though she got an emergency restraining order against him, he repeatedly harassed her by phone after the incident, seemingly trying to convince her not to press charges, she said. Rogers' apartment was also in a complex where her boyfriend's family lived, giving them an opportunity to keep tabs on her activities and report back to her estranged partner, she added.

"He knows everywhere I go," she said. Rogers wanted to move to Sacramento or Los Angeles where she had family. And Victim Compensation offers up to $2,000 for relocation, which could have helped her pay for transportation, first month's rent and a security deposit. "I would've had that opportunity to relocate and get a fresh new start," she said.

Without the financial aid, Rogers stayed in Stockton, started using drugs again, and by April 2010, just two months after the incident, was living on the streets.

THE EXCLUSION OF PEOPLE ON PAROLE AND probation appears to be rooted in a belief that people who commit crimes cannot then become victims, too. Notably, the statute outlining Victim Compensation eligibility states that people who have been convicted of a felony should be considered a lower priority than non-felons. Wayne Strumpfer, chief counsel of the Victim Compensation and Government Claims Board, said this part of the law currently has no practical application, and that once off parole and probation, applicants with felonies on their records are treated the same as others. Still, the language reflects an ingrained bias against people with criminal records – a fact that today can play out in ways beyond the ban on parolees and probationers.

Ruben Leal was shot on October 11, 2010 in East Oakland. Leal, then 22 years old, suffered a collapsed lung and fractured shinbone and temporarily had to use a wheelchair. Two days after the shooting, his life got a lot worse. On October 13, 2010, the City of Oakland held a press conference announcing that it was seeking an injunction against 42 alleged members of the Fruitvale "criminal street gang" known as the Norteños. Leal, who was born and raised in Oakland and had been taking classes at Laney College at the time, was named as one of the gang members. The Oakland City Attorney's Office, with support from the Oakland Police Department, was seeking a civil restraining order that would restrict the activity of the named defendants. Leal said he was not involved with the gang at the time of the injunction.

"Me being shot was used as evidence for the gang injunction," said Leal, who is now 25 and works as an outreach coordinator with Communities United for Restorative Youth Justice. As part of the injunction, OPD officer Douglass Keely filed a declaration outlining each defendant's criminal history and evidence of gang ties. Summarizing Leal's involvement, Keely noted that the East Oakland resident had been injured in a drive-by incident in which as many as twelve rounds were fired. The report also listed Leal's criminal history – all minor incidents that OPD said tied him to the Norteños gang. (The report mentioned a "pending" felony case, but prosecutors eventually dropped those charges against Leal).

After the shooting, the officer who showed up at his home to talk to him about the incident was Keely, Leal recalled. "This is the same guy that wants to put this gang injunction on me. This guy wants to talk to me?"

His attorneys advised against it. "It was a conflict of interest,” said Leal. “I would’ve talked with any cop and tell them my story, but not ... Keely.”

Michael Siegel, one of the lawyers who represented alleged gang members in the case, said that police searched and raided the homes of those named in the injunction soon after it was filed. When Keely arrived at the home of Leal, it wasn’t even clear if he was there to talk about the recent shooting or simply to advance OPD’s gang injunction case against him in court, Siegel said. “It was an incredibly unjust situation. Keely is providing direct evidence against Ruben. It was definitely not in [Leal’s] interest ... to have communications with him.”

Siegel further noted that, at the time, Leal “was not an active gang member. He was making a positive impact on his community.”

Leal’s medical bills related to the shooting, however, had started to pile up, to more than $100,000 total at the time. He applied for Victim Compensation to cover some of the costs, which he could not afford. Within about a month, he got a notice of rejection, citing the fact that he did not cooperate with police.

“I felt like I was being revictimized,” said Leal. “I felt like I didn’t have no support from nobody.”

He and his attorneys appealed the denial, but never heard back, according to Leal and Siegel. They said they also tried to make it clear to OPD that Leal would be willing to talk to a different cop. OPD spokesperson Frank Bonifacio noted that Victim Compensation approves claims – not police departments. Keely declined to comment on Leal’s case, but said that, in general, a victim can have his attorney present when talking to police and in some cases can give a statement to a different officer if there is a concern about a specific investigator. But it is crucial that victims cooperate, he said: “The most important thing for us is to solve the case any way possible.”

Regardless, Leal did not get the financial support California typically provides to victims of gun violence, which was a significant obstacle to his physical and psychological recovery.

“The folks that have suffered this trauma – they should invest in these people. This is not rocket science,” said Leal. “If you don’t help them overcome that traumatic experience, they’re going to find a way, and the way they find is not going to be healthy for them or for others.... The way they are going to feel better is reproducing that trauma onto someone else.”

In other words, the cycle of violence continues. And the pain lingers. After the shooting, Leal suffered several serious panic attacks. “He had hurt in his eyes and in his spirit,” said George Galvis, executive director of Communities United for Restorative Youth Justice, recalling his first time meeting Leal, shortly after the shooting. “He looked wounded.”

Leal said he has made significant progress since the incident. Still, he added, “Some of those scars are never going to heal.”

* * *

THE VICTIM COMPENSATION PROGRAM’S rejection of Leal is a relatively common occurrence, according to some Alameda County activists. People caught up in street violence often have had past interactions with law enforcement, which can become an obstacle to receiving the aid they need to recover. Leal said he could think of about ten people he knows who have been denied, even some who cooperated with police despite the risks associated with snitching. The only time he has heard of approvals were for families of homicide victims seeking coverage for funeral expenses.

Victim Compensation also bars access for those involved in the events leading up to the crime, including “mutual combat,” “illegal drug-related activity” and “gang involvement.” The program’s regulations state that gang membership alone is not a disqualifying factor, but several advocates who help victims navigate the application process said it seems that way in practice.

related, then that's something ... that can get you denied," said Linnea Ashley, training and advocacy manager of the National Network of Hospital-based Violence Intervention Programs. Ashley is based in Oakland at the offices of Youth ALIVE!, a nonprofit and a founding member of the network.

Erroneous statements in police reports can also disqualify victims from receiving compensation, said Rafael Vasquez, lead hospital intervention specialist with Youth ALIVE!'s Caught in the Crossfire program. That program offers case management for victims, often starting at hospitals immediately after a shooting. Part of that work involves helping them navigate the Victim Compensation process. Vasquez recalled one case of a young teenager who was shot in the head and survived – but was denied compensation because of a belt found at the crime scene that cops said indicated his gang involvement. In actuality, Vasquez said, the belt didn't even belong to the victim, who was not a gang member; rather, the crime simply occurred in an area with regular gang violence.

In these kinds of cases, people are essentially rejected because of where they live, a form of victim-blaming, said Kyndra Simmons, Caught in the Crossfire program manager. "You went into an area where you know there's criminal activity. It's almost as if you put yourself in that situation. But that's where they can afford to live."

Youth ALIVE! sometimes reaches out to police, requesting that they amend or clarify statements so that a victim is not incorrectly declared responsible for the crime. From there, the organization appeals the compensation denials, a process that can be successful. But not all victims have these advocates. In addition to these more nuanced obstacles at Youth ALIVE!, around 20 to 30 percent of the victims that the organization supports are on parole and probation.

"The system that is currently in place views victims and perpetrators in a very simplistic way," said Nicole Lee, founding executive director of Urban Peace Movement, an anti-violence group in Oakland. "You're either a victim or a perpetrator and you can't be both. The reality is ... violence is a cycle. And as a society, we have to find policies that disrupt the cycle."

For a variety of reasons, domestic violence victims can also be very reluctant to file charges or cooperate with police, but that doesn't mean they aren't deserving of aid, said McCray, who works as a domestic violence counselor at S.F. Bay Counseling and Education. "When they try to separate, that's the most dangerous time," she said of people who attempt to get away from their abusive partners. McCray also noted that domestic violence survivors face risks when reporting their partners to cops. Plus, she said, "women often times stay in domestic violence situations because of their children. They are the glue of the family."

Deep distrust of law enforcement can also motivate their lack of cooperation, said McCray, who works with formerly incarcerated people as the director of the Women's Resource Center, which is affiliated with the San Francisco Sheriff's Department. "There's a cultural stigma behind talking to cops, because these communities have already been oppressed ... and targeted by police forces." And the Victim Compensation denials sting, she said. "It keeps them depressed. It keeps them angry.... And it's just so fucking petty."

Strumpfer, the Victim Compensation chief counsel, said that the program has limitations in place for "public safety purposes." If a victim is refusing to talk to police and withholding information, then the state cannot support that individual by offering benefits, he said.

"The burden is on us to show a lack of cooperation," he said, noting that there are exceptions to the rule and that Victim Compensation would consider the risks a victim faces in talking to law enforcement. The state cannot aid victims who break the law or irresponsibly put themselves in harm's way prior to the incident, he continued. Strumpfer cited examples of a burglar who is shot during the act or an individual actively enticing someone to fight at a bar.

Ken Ryken, head of the Alameda County District Attorney's restitution unit, explained it this way: "If a person is engaged in criminal activity that's dangerous, they assumed that risk.... The state shouldn't have to bear that cost."

In cases of domestic violence, state law states that victims should not be rejected solely because they did not file a police report and that the program should consider other evidence such as medical records or the existence of a restraining order. But victims can still be denied compensation if they refuse to testify, request that the suspect not be prosecuted, or decline to "completely and truthfully" respond to a request for information "in a timely manner."

Regarding the question of gang involvement, Strumpfer said that the state reviews applications on a case-by-case basis and only rejects requests when it finds involvement in the crime in question. "It's not just a throwaway line in the police report."

Asked why the state does not compensate felony parolees and probationers, he responded that this policy has been written into law for a long time and that it is "just another condition of being on probation or parole." And it's not necessarily about saving the state money, Myers noted: "It's more of a policy decision, not a financial decision."

Strumpfer pointed out that the program is funded by offenders through restitution fees, which are the mandatory fines required of all adults convicted of misdemeanors and felonies in the state. "If you're a criminal offender, you're paying into the program," Strumpfer said. "You may very well likely owe restitution."

Critics reject this notion, arguing that people forced to financially support this fund should not be disqualified from accessing it when they are in need. (Prisoners' rights groups also strongly oppose the restitution fines on a more fundamental level, due to the fact that the fees can become insurmountable debts for people reentering society after incarceration).

Because discrimination against people on felony parole and probation is written into law, expanded access would require legislative action. I asked Strumpfer if last year's debate around sex workers' rights had sparked further evaluation within the program about its ongoing exclusionary practices, including the exclusion of people convicted of nonviolent crimes, like drug offenses. He replied: "The [program's] board members have not showed any signs of wanting to review anything else."

WHEN THE VICTIM COMPENSATION program is a dead end, people recovering from violence must look elsewhere for support. And advocacy organizations all too familiar with the state's denials have focused on alternative ways to support victims, while recognizing that financial aid can only go so far anyway.

Communities United for Restorative Youth Justice sometimes leads "healing ceremonies," for example, which give victims and family members a meaningful opportunity to grieve and reflect, said Galvis, the executive director. "It's about how we restore balance and restore that spirit for people who have suffered from trauma," he said. "There's strength and healing in letting those tears flow."

Leal said it made a huge difference when advocates like Galvis reached out to him. "These different community members came out and supported me on their own dime just because they wanted to.... That helped me with my healing journey."

Communities United also organizes fundraisers for victims, Galvis said. This can be critical when families don't get adequate compensation from the state.

As for Samantha Rogers, she was homeless for several months in 2010 after the state refused to help her relocate. She ended up at a rescue mission and eventually received significant counseling, which helped her get back on her feet. But it took time. And Victim Compensation could have put her on a very different path, she said. "If they could've supported me back then, there's no telling where I could've been four years later."

Rogers has been off of parole for more than three years and now gets to spend more time with her four children, daughters ages 30 and 25 and sons ages 22 and 20. Today, she regularly speaks at events and marches in rallies advocating for the rights of incarcerated people.

Part Two: Sentenced to Poverty

The state often traps formerly incarcerated people – even those convicted of low-level offenses – with insurmountable debts.

WHEN CHLOE TURNER WAS IN STATE prison, her family sent her money on a few occasions. It wasn't much, but it was more than her fellow prisoners – many of whom were serving life sentences – received, since they often went years without getting any mail at all. So she was grateful for the contact. And even a tiny amount of cash helped.

"It's really hard because you're put in a position where the only freedom you really have is once a month you can do some shopping," explained Turner, a 35-year-old East Bay resident who spent most of her twenties in and out of jail and prison for various drug-related offenses.

In prison, "shopping" means purchasing basic necessities from the commissary, such as soap, deodorant and snacks. And without financial support from loved ones, most prisoners are forced to rely on low-paying prison jobs to make money. Turner cleaned toilets. She also briefly worked in the kitchen, but spent a majority of her time doing janitorial jobs – mopping floors, picking up trash and cleaning bathrooms. She made roughly seventeen cents an hour. California state prisoners can earn a maximum of 37 cents an hour.

With these kinds of measly wages, many prisoners just don't have enough money to buy the basic items they need. Moreover, much of the money they earn or receive from family members is confiscated by the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation. The department automatically seizes half of the income that most prisoners earn, as well as half of the money deposited into their prison bank accounts by family members. The state collects this money to pay off a prisoner's restitution fines, which are the financial penalties that all people convicted of crimes in the state are ordered to pay upon sentencing. It is the criminal offender's so-called "debt to society," a punishment in addition to being sent to prison or jail or put on probation.

Along with exacerbating the financial hardships placed on prisoners, the confiscation of a family member's gift can be emotionally upsetting, given the symbolic value this support can carry. "Your money is being taken and you're not able to buy the stuff you need – you are completely helpless," said Turner, noting that she eventually told her family to stop sending cash altogether.

And when Turner was released from prison in 2008, the burden of restitution was far from over. Her debts from a series of convictions added up and quickly became insurmountable, dragging her down as she struggled to turn her life around and move beyond her criminal past. Six years later, she still owes more than $10,000 in unpaid restitution fines and is unsure when she will ever be able to pay it off. Turner has a full-time job, helping women reenter society after prison as a program coordinator with Community Works West, a nonprofit affiliated with the Women's Resource Center at the San Francisco Sheriff's Department. But even though she has a job, it doesn't pay well enough for her to live in the pricey Bay Area and make a significant dent in her debt at the same time. "I can't get my life together because I owe all this money," she said. "I'm just trying to live."

In California, restitution fines support the Victim Compensation program, a state fund that provides financial aid to many victims of violent crime, helping them with a wide range of expenses, such as medical bills, mental health services and crime scene cleanup. The program has faced a backlash over the last year because it denies certain victims the right to collect compensation.

But the institutionalized discrimination against certain victims is not the only reason that prisoners' rights advocates contend that California's Victim Compensation program is broken. Activists also lament the fact that the program, on a fundamental level, is funded on the backs of low-income people trying to rehabilitate their lives after incarceration. The money for victims supported by the program does not come from taxpayers, but rather from all adults convicted of felonies and misdemeanors in California, including people who commit drug crimes and other nonviolent, victimless offenses.

"The whole way in which the fund is set up puts the burden on a group of people ... that really have no money and are sucked into a debtor situation," said Diana Block, a founding member of the California Coalition for Women Prisoners.

Critics further argue that, from a financial standpoint, there's no reason the fines levied on people convicted of crimes in California have to be so steep in the first place. In fiscal year 2012-13, state officials reported a restitution fund "reserve" of nearly $80 million.

In addition, there's evidence that the financial penalties levied by judges are simply too large for most people to afford. Data from the Department of Corrections shows that most people sentenced to state prison have been unable to pay off their restitution debts.

As is the case with Turner, the financial burdens of restitution can stay with people for years, creating yet another barrier to rehabilitation post-incarceration – one that can make it hard to secure a job, go back to school or even keep up with rent. In this way, the state traps people in poverty, shackling them to the prison system after they've left it.

RUBEN LEAL KNOWS FIRSTHAND HOW THE state's Victim Compensation system can intensify the suffering of those already in pain. As described in Part One, after Leal was shot in a drive-by incident in 2010, the state refused to offer him any aid due to his alleged failure to cooperate with police. The East Oakland resident is also intimately familiar with the burden that the state's restitution system can place on families trying to help their loved ones behind bars. Leal's brother has been in prison since 2004, and every time his mother sends his brother money, the department takes its 50 percent cut.

"All these people, mostly from low-income families, are paying into this fund – and they're the same people that don't qualify [to receive victim compensation]," said Leal, who works as an outreach coordinator with Communities United for Restorative Youth Justice, a local nonprofit. "People think that money is coming from taxpayers, which it's not. Folks are paying into that fund with restitution. I feel like the whole system is flawed." Even as the state seizes half the money his mother sends him, Leal's brother will very likely have large unpaid debts upon his release.

In addition to the misconception that Victim Compensation is a taxpayer-supported program, the role of restitution in the California criminal justice system is also widely misunderstood. While some assume that restitution simply means offenders paying victims for specific damages, in reality it's more complex.

There are two main forms of restitution in the state: One is the "direct order" that offenders must pay to a victim. This is a financial penalty that a person convicted of a crime must pay directly to the victim to repay the losses he or she suffered. The other type is the restitution "fine" – the offender's mandatory "debt to society." Judges order these fines at sentencing for every misdemeanor and felony offense, and these payments go to the state, making up the majority of revenue of the "Restitution Fund."

It is from this pool of money, which has generally remained static in recent years, that the state compensates victims of violence – beyond what they receive directly from the person convicted of the crime. The Victim Compensation program also gets some federal dollars from restitution fines paid by people convicted in federal court. Governor Jerry Brown's fiscal year 2013-14 budget calls for Victim Compensation to spend $75 million of the fund on victims, but there is no cap, meaning victims are never rejected due to the financial limits of the fund.

"These are rights at a constitutional level, which means they are no less important than a defendant's right to counsel," said Ken Ryken, head of the Alameda County District Attorney's restitution unit. He was referring to California's Victims' Bill of Rights, which first passed in 1982 and was amended in 2008. This amendment to the state constitution outlines a victim's right to restitution, noting that people who suffer losses as a result of criminal activity have a right to seek and secure restitution from offenders – and that restitution shall be ordered from convicted wrongdoers in every case in which a victim suffers a loss.

When it comes to “direct orders,” there is little dispute that convicted offenders should be held financially responsible for the losses their victims incur as a result of the crime. The additional mandatory restitution fines, however, are controversial.

Ryken said that restitution fines make it possible to help victims with serious and costly needs. If a victim has hundreds of thousands of dollars in medical bills, for example, it’s likely that an offender, who may be serving a long prison sentence, would not be able to cover the expenses. The state can then draw from the Restitution Fund and reimburse the victim in a timely manner, which also ensures that the victim does not have an ongoing debtor relationship with the offender over time. In these scenarios, the offender is then in debt to the state, not the victim. “It’s really a smart idea at the state level,” Ryken said.

In California, the statutory restitution fine amounts have steadily increased in recent years. For misdemeanor fines, the minimum amount a judge can order, as of 2014, is $150, up from $100 in 2011; the maximum is $1,000. For felonies, the minimum fine is now $300, up from $200 in 2011; the maximum is $10,000. These fines are entirely separate from orders offenders may be paying to their victims. Payment of restitution fees is mandatory; the debt cannot be eliminated through bankruptcy.

“When I look at the victim restitution fund, what I see is a hostage relationship,” said Dorsey Nunn, executive director of Legal Services for Prisoners with Children. “We’re taxing the family members of incarcerated people by seizing money that they send their loved one.... They’re demanding ransom.”

Nunn said he never spent the ten dollars his daughter sent him while he was incarcerated, because it meant so much to him on a personal level. And having the state take half of a family member’s gift is incredibly painful for any prisoner, he said. Advocates also noted that losing a significant cut of already-paltry prison wages can be very frustrating. According to the Department of Corrections, wages for low-level jobs can pay as little as eight cents per hour. After the restitution payment, that’s four pennies.

“People don’t understand how much people have to pay for their own upkeep and survival in prison,” said Block, of the Coalition for Women Prisoners, citing the need to purchase basic toiletry items. “All the things that help you make it through, you have to pay for them. They are not given to you. And the only way you can pay for them is whatever small amount of money you can make ... or if you have families or friends who want to help support you.”

In a way, these criticisms bolster one of the policy arguments in favor of the restitution system, supporters say. Ryken pointed to case law that advocates for the ordering of full restitution in every case, regardless of the offender’s ability to pay. “It’s something the state wants the defendant to bear fully to appreciate the weight of their conduct and the full extent of their conduct,” he said. Restitution fines, he added, support “rehabilitation of the offender, making them fully responsible for their conduct, and deterring future misconduct. If the penalty or burden is large enough, it will cause the defendant from recidivating – from doing it again.”

But for some people with criminal records, restitution can have the opposite effect.

* * *

ONE DAY IN THE SUMMER OF 2011, De'Mario Lewis almost gave up. The 24-year-old West Oakland resident was trying to provide for his son, who was then six months old, but he could not find any work. At the time, Lewis had an unpaid restitution fine from a recent misdemeanor case. With the lingering debt, he could not clear his legal record, a fact that prevented him from getting a job. And without a job, he couldn't pay off what he owed.

"What do we do? How do we make some money? Do we sit up here with a change cup?" Lewis said. "Or shit, do we hire ourselves and buy a bundle of crack cocaine and go sell it? That'd be the easiest route."

Lewis remembered the day that he seriously considered making money selling drugs. At that very moment, he said, his baby boy stared up at him and poked his face with his tiny hand, temporarily blinding him. "He grabbed me between my eyes with his two fingers," he said. "I looked at him, but I couldn't see him."

It was a powerful sign, he continued. "God showed me that if I go out there and do that, I'll never see my son again. That was my breaking point."

Inspired by his son, Lewis chose not to sell drugs. But his internal battle underscores the contradictions of the restitution system. While some argue that these financial punishments are designed to discourage people from reoffending, in practice they can make it very challenging for debtors to stay out of trouble. Lewis' struggle also highlights the way restitution can punish people who commit relatively minor crimes.

He was charged with illegal possession of a firearm in September 2009. After fighting the charge for months, in February of 2010, he was ordered to spend 45 days in county jail. When he was released he had nearly $800 to pay off in restitution.

"I was just so furious because I was like, 'I really want to get my life back right,'" said Lewis. "I had this restitution hanging over my neck. It's bullshit. It's unfair."

This catch-22 is just one of many ways in which fines can become obstacles after incarceration, drowning people in debt and trapping them in poverty.

When he was released from custody, Lewis initially started paying $50 a month, but even those small payments proved challenging. With an unpaid restitution debt he couldn't clear his criminal record, and thus was not eligible to get the license he needed to get a job as a security guard. Meanwhile, he was trying to prepare for the birth of his first child, who was born in January 2011. He eventually landed a temporary, part-time job with Oakland Rising, a local nonprofit, but still could not pay off his debts for months.

"I can work towards something better in my life, but when you have certain limitations on you, you have to settle for less," he said.

As he started raising his son, Lewis stopped paying restitution regularly.

At the same time he managed to stay out of trouble. Last fall, he finally received some good news – he was offered a job as a teaching assistant. But he would not be able to start until he cleared his criminal record, which meant he had to pay his restitution in full. So with support from local advocacy groups United Roots Oakland, Urban Peace Movement and Urban Strategies Council, Lewis finally paid off his restitution debt in December 2013. He's in the process of getting his record cleared and hopes to start teaching full-time soon. In the meantime, he has been working part-time as a ticket-taker at the Coliseum. "I'm back to being normal again," he said.

But Lewis still struggles to understand why the system sets people up for failure. "People make mistakes ... but they do want to change their lives," he said, adding, "if you're paying restitution, I feel like you should be paying restitution to a victim ... people who got robbed or brutally beat up. That's what restitution is for."

While restitution made it difficult for Lewis to get a job, it can have more severe consequences for people convicted of serious crimes.

"Absolutely, victims have a right to restitution to be made whole," said Alameda County Public Defender Brendon Woods. "The flipside is that one mistake by your client can essentially ruin their lives, and when you have those clients who have taken every step to get back on the right track – they've completed probation, they've stayed out of trouble, they've done what they're supposed to do – and they have this huge financial obligation, it makes it very hard for them to move forward."

At the state level, parole agents and officials with the Victim Compensation program refer formerly incarcerated people with unpaid restitution debts to the state Franchise Tax Board, which assumes responsibility for collection. The mechanisms are different for each county, but often involve private collection agencies that go after those in debt. These entities function in a similar manner to credit card companies in pursuit of debtors.

"Like any commercial practice, their compensation depends on how successful they are, so they may be fairly aggressive," said Ryken of the Alameda County District Attorney's Office. (Alameda County does not contract with private companies for this service and is one of two counties in California with a dedicated restitution court that oversees the collection process).

Debt collectors may intercept income tax refunds, withhold wages from paychecks and even take money directly from an individual's bank account. In some cases, fees and premiums may add to a person's debt. The state can also place a lien on inheritances. Meanwhile, debt can severely damage an individual's credit, prevent people from getting a driver's license and block an otherwise eligible person from clearing his or her record of misdemeanor convictions.

For some people with criminal records, the combined impact of these consequences can make it impossible to live a normal life – even years after incarceration.

THE AMOUNT OF TIME IT TAKES CRIMINAL offenders to pay their restitution fees varies tremendously and cannot be tracked, according to Anne Gordon, a spokesperson for the Victim Compensation and Government Claims Board. It can range from a few months to years, she said.

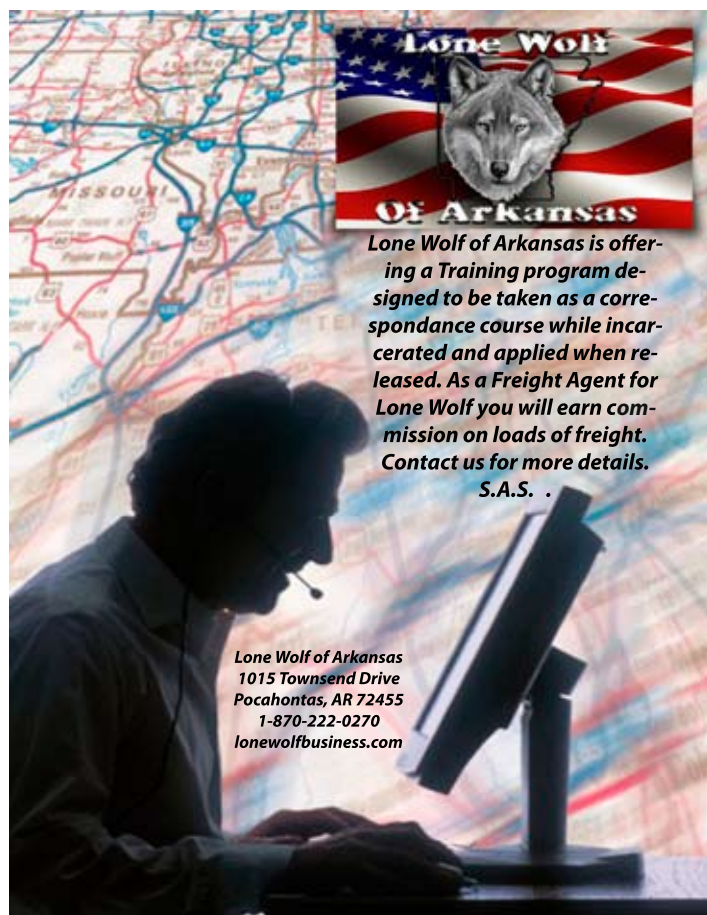

Data on the amount of fines ordered versus the amount of fines collected, however, sheds some light on people's inability to pay. In California, from 1992 to 2013, judges levied $812 million in restitution fines against criminal defendants who were sent to state prison, according to statistics provided by Dana Simas, spokesperson for the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation. During that same time period, the state collected only about $190 million, or 23 percent of the total. And the collection rate for restitution direct orders, which are supposed to be paid by criminal offenders directly to their victims, was even lower for people who were sentenced to state prison: Of the more than $3 billion in fines levied during that period, the state has collected the equivalent of about 2 percent.

Teeoni and Keyuna Newsom have learned the hard way how the restitution system traps people in debt. The two women met about five years ago shortly after they were both released from state prison, and they have been partners ever since. They got married last July and now live in Richmond where they're raising their twelve-year-old daughter. Teeoni, 36, works full-time as the young men's case manager at Community Works West, the nonprofit organization affiliated with the San Francisco Sheriff's Department. Keyuna, 33, works as a part-time administrative assistant for Resolve to Stop the Violence, a program of Community Works.

Teeoni said she was once a gang member in Southern California and spent roughly seventeen years behind bars for a range of crimes, including robbery, carjacking, assault and more. Teeoni has "two strikes" on her record under California's Three Strikes Law, meaning she could get a life sentence if she were convicted of another serious felony. Keyuna spent about two years in prison for possession and grand theft in a case that she said involved an undercover cop (and thus no actual victim). Through a series of programs and job opportunities, the two have turned themselves around and are now focused on rebuilding their lives together and raising a family. By all measures, their criminal histories are behind them – except for their restitution fines.

When Teeoni was first released in 2009, she had an initial debt of roughly $3,000, which the state began collecting by taking a 10-percent cut from every paycheck. Then one day in 2010, collectors confiscated roughly $4,000 directly from the joint bank account she shares with Keyuna, who also had thousands of dollars to pay off. At the time, they weren't even sure whose unpaid fines led to the sweep. But their account was wiped clean – seemingly out of nowhere.

"They took all of it, like every single bit that was in the bank account," recalled Teeoni, noting that they only realized what had happened when their checks started bouncing. "What is the point of me having a job if you're going to take all of my money?"

"I was devastated," added Keyuna. "We had a nice chunk of change saved up ... and they took everything."

And it didn't end there. In January of this year, Teeoni had $316 more taken out of her paycheck, and learned that debt collectors intend to start taking a whopping 25 percent of her income. These deductions apparently will continue until she pays off a $2,000 debt, separate from the fines she first paid upon her release.

Teeoni said the lost income is already a significant strain on her family. "I can't not feed everybody," she said. "I could lose my house. I could lose my car. Am I going to lose everything that I've been working for all this time? Because I came out here to change everything and it's like, as soon as I changed, you decided, 'you know what? Here, pay this.'"

Teeoni said she understands the importance of taking responsibility for her past actions, but noted that she has served her time and has already paid thousands of dollars. The lingering fines seem meaningless and unbeatable to her. "Should I just quit my job and go back to what I was doing and then they can't find me?"

Teeoni said she would never break the law again, but noted that, as a case manager, she regularly sees clients who, in the face of unpaid fines, start selling drugs or disappear altogether.

One woman with large restitution fines, who requested anonymity in order to protect her future job prospects, recalled through tears a time when she had to choose between paying for her cap and gown for her post-graduate ceremony at UC Berkeley and paying her next restitution fee. Another woman, a San Francisco mother of four, also requested anonymity due to the fact that she has temporarily stopped paying restitution because she can't afford it. She said that after she was released from jail, she couldn't purchase furniture for her children's bedroom because of steep fines she owed. Her difficult financial situation is preventing her from moving out of a bad neighborhood, and she can't find any full-time work while she has unpaid debts.

These challenges are common for low-income people saddled with hefty fines, said Woods, the public defender. "In the bigger scheme of things, it's such a low priority, because they're worried about housing and food ... getting their kids to school," he said of restitution fines. "If you have addiction issues, you're just worried about staying off the rock. There are so many other bigger issues that they are dealing with than the restitution fund fine."

Critics argue that California could clearly reduce these restitution burdens without bankrupting its financial aid program for victims. The budget for fiscal year 2014-15 includes a nearly $62 million restitution fund "balance" or "reserve for economic uncertainties."

Jon Myers, the deputy executive officer of public affairs and outreach for the Victim Compensation and Government Claims Board, argued that the program overall does not have cash to spare and has generally been spending more than it takes in each year. In 2012-13, the fund spent roughly $112 million while it collected roughly $108 million, the majority of which came from fines. The roughly $4.4 million difference illustrates the program's "structural imbalance," Myers said. "The fund is not completely secure," he said, noting that state officials recently reduced payment rates for certain expenses for victims to help ensure the solvency of the program's finances.

"I work with victims every day. I hear stories about a mother who lost a child and has to pay for a funeral she can't afford," he said. "What's the cost of the casket that a mother has to pay? A domestic violence victim that has to go out and find a new home?"

His sympathy, he added, always falls to victims in debt, not criminal offenders.

And last year, she graduated from the University of San Francisco with a bachelor's degree in organizational behavior and leadership. Her plan is to eventually go to law school – a dream she will likely have to put on hold until she pays off all of her restitution.

The Newsoms, who are close friends of Turner, will also likely have difficulty achieving their long-term goals while they are still in debt. They said they want to someday start their own youth program to offer an alternative to gangs. But that would require a level of financial stability, which, at this point, seems unattainable, said Teeoni. "I don't have money to save anymore.... And if I put money in the bank to try and save up, they are going to take it away from me."

BJS Report: Jail Population Increases in Indian Country

JAILS ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS ACROSS the U.S. are housing more offenders despite a decline in violent crimes, according to a report released last year.

The most recent annual Survey of Jails in Indian Country by the Bureau of Justice Statistics (BJS) reported that 2,364 prisoners were confined in 79 Indian country jails at midyear 2012 – a 5.6% increase in the jail population over the previous year.

The June 2013 survey noted, however, that only 32% of prisoners in those jails were incarcerated for a violent crime – a decrease of almost 10% from a high in 2007. Most violent offenses were for domestic violence and assault.

A majority of the total Indian country jail population (51%) was incarcerated in just 14 facilities, with nearly half of those located in Arizona. While several Indian country jails saw a decrease in incarceration rates, the Tohono O'odham Adult Detention Center in Arizona – with the largest Indian country jail population – held 229 offenders in 2012, an increase of 17.4% from the previous year.

Sixteen facilities were operating above 15% of their rated capacity as of June 2012. Indian country jails admitted a total of

Turner is eager to advance her education and career partly because she wants to someday work as a public defender. "I really want to make a difference with the clients I work with," she said. "I could advocate for them on a different level. I know where they come from. That would give me an advantage."

But with outstanding restitution debts, Teeoni is unable to access many of the student loans she would need for law school. She also can't get a Certificate of Rehabilitation, an official document that is required for admission to law school and one that could significantly boost her future job prospects.

This is despite the fact that she has, by every other measure, rehabilitated her life.

12,502 people during 2012; the average length of stay was 5.4 days.

Sadly, higher jail populations have not resulted in increases in programming, treatment and educational services. According to the BJS's 2011 Survey of Jails in Indian Country, almost half of Indian country jails lacked GED programs, over 75% did not provide vocational or job skills programs, 64% did not offer life skills and around 46% did not have domestic violence counseling. Sex offender treatment was available at just eight Indian country jails. However, almost all of the jails offered drug or alcohol abuse treatment programs.

Most Native American prisoners are housed in correctional facilities outside Indian country reservations. Nationally, the BJS reported that 27,500 Native Americans and Alaska Natives were incarcerated in federal or state prisons and local jails in 2011; another 49,000 were on probation or parole.

From the Editor

by Paul Wright

I HAVE LONG OBSERVED THAT IT COSTS A lot of money to be poor in America. Since our criminal justice system falls almost exclusively on those who are poor, it should be no surprise that a great deal of time and energy goes into keeping the poor ensnared in the justice system.

For decades, PLN has reported on the measures used to criminalize the poor and ensure they remain impoverished through imprisonment, fines, restitution, "cost of incarceration" fees, court costs, high prison and jail phone rates, and all the myriad other ways in which prisoners, detainees and their families are financially exploited.

This month's cover story delves into some of the details of the intentional immiseration of those swept into the machinery of mass incarceration. While officially touted as a means of making mass imprisonment more affordable for the ruling class, the reality is that the exploitative nature of our justice system merely increases the number of people who, for the most part, are unable to pay the costs of being a prisoner or defendant. If the criminal justice programs designed to siphon money from the poor were effective, then prisons, jails and the court system wouldn't need additional money from government coffers.

At the Human Rights Defense Center (HRDC), PLN's parent organization, we are doing our part to try to reduce the cost of being poor in America. For example, we continue to push the Federal Communications Commission to reduce and cap the costs of all prison and jail phone calls, including intrastate (in-state) calls. On July 9, 2014, PLN managing editor Alex Friedmann and I testified at an FCC workshop in Washington, DC about the continuing need for reform with respect to prison and jail phone rates. We will continue to report on developments in this regard; HRDC is a co-founder and coordinator of the national Campaign for Prison Phone Justice, along with MAG-Net and Working Narratives.

You can help! We need copies of phone bills reflecting the cost and charges associated with prison and jail phone calls. If you or your family has such bills, please send them to our Florida mailing address to the attention of David Ganim, our PPJ Director. In addition to costs related to the calls themselves, we are also interested in additional charges such as the cost of setting up a prepaid account, putting money on phone accounts using credit cards, monthly account fees, etc.

Between now and the end of the year we are running our Subscription Madness campaign, which offers steeply discounted multiple one-year subscriptions to PLN for first-time subscribers. The goal is to introduce new people to PLN. # PLN Settles Lawsuit Against Kenosha County, Wisconsin for $116,500

by Derek Gilna

AFTER 29 PRISONERS AT A JAIL IN Kenosha County, Wisconsin did not receive their monthly copies of Prison Legal News or informational brochures and soft-cover books mailed by PLN, PLN filed suit in federal court alleging First and Fourteenth Amendment violations by the Sheriff's Office. According to Jon Loevy, one of the attorneys representing PLN, the county agreed to a settlement in May 2014 requiring it to pay damages and attorney's fees, and to change its policy on publications sent to prisoners.

Loevy noted that county officials had reversed "an unconstitutional policy and [brought] it into compliance." He added: "To their credit, rather than spending taxpayer money fighting a losing battle, they decided to make the policy compliant with the First Amendment."

PLN had alleged in its June 27, 2013 complaint that the Kenosha County jail's blanket ban on Prison Legal News and similar publications violated a "constitutionally protected liberty interest in communication with incarcerated individuals, a right clearly established under existing law."

Shortly after PLN filed suit, Kenosha County began to backtrack on its policy, stating through a spokesman that "nothing was brought to [the county's] attention until the lawsuit was brought. We immediately looked at [the policy], realized it was out of date and updated it to allow magazines and books with some restriction on content" – such as publications that pose a threat to the safety or security of the facility or that contain sexual or lewd content.

As part of the settlement, Kenosha County agreed not to implement "blanket bans" on books, magazines, newspapers or other publications sent directly to prisoners from publishers. Both prisoners and senders of rejected publications must receive written notice, as well as information on how to appeal censorship decisions. The county is also required to post the new policy at the jail and on its website, according to an Order of Stipulation and Dismissal entered pursuant to the settlement. Lastly, the county agreed to pay $116,500 in damages and attorney's fees.

PLN was represented by the Chicago law firm of Loevy & Lovey and by Human Rights Defense Center general counsel Lance Weber. See: Prison Legal News v. Beth, U.S.D.C. (E.D. Wis.), Case No. 2:13-cv-00737-JPS.

PLN has long advocated that prisoners and detainees have the same First and Fourteenth Amendment rights as other citizens to receive written materials, subject to legitimate security concerns, and PLN has filed and won numerous lawsuits to protect those rights. [See, e.g., PLN, May 2010, p.8]. Without the ability to receive books and other publications, prisoners are denied access to information that can assist them while incarcerated and help them reintegrate into society following their release. ■

Qui Tam Lawsuits Under the Federal False Claims Act – An Overview

by Sabarish Neelakanta

THE QUI TAM PROVISIONS OF THE FEDERAL False Claims Act (FCA)<sup>1</sup> exist to encourage whistleblowers who are aware of fraud against the government to bring such information forward. See 31 U.S.C. §§ 3729–3733. Private contractors guilty of defrauding the federal government are liable for a civil penalty of $5,500 to $11,000 per claim, plus three times the government's damages. Id. at § 3729(b).

A civil suit filed by an individual on behalf of the government is known as a qui tam action, and the person bringing the action is referred to as a "relator." The relator may be awarded 15–30% of the proceeds of any recovery or settlement, plus expenses and reasonable attorneys' fees and costs. Id. at § 3730(d)(1)–(2). Recoveries in FCA cases often result in millions of dollars in settlements or damage awards, providing a significant incentive for individuals with inside knowledge of fraudulent conduct to report such activity.

Within the criminal justice context, qui tam lawsuits can be used to expose mistreatment and fraud at privately- or publicly-operated correctional facilities. Prisons are required to provide adequate food, medical care (including mental health and dental care) and sanitation, among other things. To the extent that private contractors fail to adhere to these requirements, such as billing federal agencies for services not provided, they may be violating contractual obligations or engaging in fraud against the U.S. government, thereby subjecting them to an FCA suit.

This article is intended to provide readers with a general overview of the qui tam provisions of the FCA and similar statutes in individual states, as well as the procedural requirements for and statutory bars to filing a qui tam action.

What is the False Claims Act?

THE FCA, IN PERTINENT PART, MAKES IT illegal for any person to: "1) knowingly present, or cause to be presented, to an officer or employee of the United States Government or a member of the Armed Forces of the United States a false or fraudulent claim for payment or approval; 2) knowingly make, use, or cause to be made or used, a false record or statement to get a false or fraudulent claim paid or approved by the Government; 3) conspire to defraud the Government by getting a false or fraudulent claim paid or approved by the Government;

...or 7) knowingly make, use, or cause to be made or used, a false record or statement to conceal, avoid, or decrease an obligation to pay or transmit money or property to the Government." Id. at § 3729(a)(1)(3).

In sum, the FCA imposes liability on any person who submits a claim<sup>2</sup> to the federal government that he or she knows (or should know) is false or fraudulent. State false claims acts prohibit the same type of conduct with respect to claims filed with state agencies.<sup>3</sup>

How do you file a False Claims Act suit?

UNLIKE A CIVIL RIGHTS CASE OR OTHER civil suits, a qui tam relator may not pursue a case pro se; because the relator is representing the government, he or she is required to have counsel. There are also special filing requirements when initiating a qui tam lawsuit under the FCA. First, the complaint must be filed with the court under seal and must not be served on the defendant. Rather, the complaint and a written statement of all material evidence substantiating the claim have to be submitted to the U.S. Attorney General (for the federal FCA) or state Attorney General (for state FCA claims). Id. at § 3730(b)(2). The case will remain under seal for 60 days in order for the government to determine whether it will intervene; the complaint cannot be served until the government decides if it will intervene and the court orders service. Id.

After the 60-day period expires, the government can: 1) request more time to investigate the claim; 2) intervene and prosecute the claim; 3) allow the relator to prosecute the claim; 4) move to dismiss the suit; or 5) try to settle the suit. See Id. at § 3730(b)(3); § 3730(b)(4)(A)(B); and § 3730(c)(2)(A)(B).

Even if the government does not intervene while the case is under seal, it may do so later upon a showing of good cause, after which it will be responsible for prosecuting the case. Id. at § 3730(c)(1). The government can also settle the case over the objection of the relator so long as there is a hearing to allow the relator to express any

Calling for Essays by Incarcerated Americans, Prison Workers, and Prison Volunteers

THE American Prison Writing Archive (APWA) is an internet-based, non-profit archive of first-hand testimony to the living and working conditions experienced by incarcerated people, prison employees, and prison volunteers. Anyone who lives, works, or volunteers inside American prisons or jails can contribute non-fiction essays, based on first-hand experience: 5,000 word limit (15 double-spaced pages); a signed APWA permission-questionnaire must be included in order to post work on the APWA. All posted work will be accessible to anyone in the world with internet access. For more information and to download the permissions-questionnaire, go to: <http://www.dhinitiative.org/projects/apwa/>, or write to: APWA, 198 College Hill Road, Clinton, NY 13323-1218. Sincerely—The APWA Editors.

concerns and the court finds the settlement is fair. Id. § 3730(c)(2)(B). The relator is entitled to 15-30% of the amount recovered if the government intervenes, and 25-30% if the relator prosecutes the claim without government intervention. Id. at § 3730(d)(1). Lastly, the FCA includes its own statute of limitations – six years for claims brought by private qui tam relators, and for actions brought by the government, three years from when the violation was or should have been discovered, but in no event more than ten years. Id. at § 3731(b).

What bars are there to filing a qui tam action?

THERE ARE SEVERAL CIRCUMSTANCES under which a qui tam action can be statutorily barred. For example: 1) The relator was convicted of criminal conduct arising from his or her role in the FCA violation. Id. at § 3730(d)(3); 2) Another qui tam action concerning the same conduct already has been filed. Id. at § 3730(b)(5); 3) The government is already a party to a civil suit or administrative civil money penalty proceeding concerning the same conduct. Id. at § 3730(e)(3); and 4) The qui tam action is based upon information that has been disclosed to the public through any of several means, including criminal, civil or administrative hearings in which the government is a party, or government hearings, audits, reports or investigations, or through the news media – unless the relator was the original source of the information. Id. at § 3730(e)(4)(A). An original source is a relator who has “inside” information or personal knowledge of fraud against the government.

There are few reported cases involving qui tam actions within the prison context. In one 1999 ruling by the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals, a prisoner brought a False Claims Act suit against Federal Prison Industries (FPI, also known as UNICOR), claiming that FPI “had falsely certified that the communication cables and weapons parts that it produced for the Department of Defense had been adequately tested and met the requisite quality standards.” The appellate court held FPI was entitled to sovereign immunity because it is a wholly-owned government corporation – not a private entity – and had not waived its immunity. See: Galvan v. Federal Prison Indus., 199 F.3d 461 (D.C. Cir. 1999). ■

Sab Neelakanta is a staff attorney for the Human Rights Defense Center (HRDC), the parent organization of Prison Legal News. HRDC is interested in representing relators who have direct knowledge and evidence of fraud involving the federal government.

Endnotes

1 Several laws, both state and federal, provide private causes of action, or legal protection and remedies for whistleblowers. This article focuses solely on the qui tam provisions of the federal False Claims Act.

2 “[A] claim includes any request or demand, whether under a contract or otherwise, for money or property which is made to a contractor, grantee, or other recipient if the United States Government provides any portion of the money or property which is requested or demanded, or if the Government will reimburse such contractor, grantee, or other recipient for any portion of the money or property which is requested or demanded.” 31 U.S.C. § 3729(c).

3 The following states have their own false claims acts which parallel the federal FCA: California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Hawaii, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, Washington and Wisconsin – plus the District of Columbia.

How to Starve the For-profit Prison Beast

by Justin Jones

I KNOW SOME PRIVATE PRISON LOBBYISTS who would love it if you were found with a cell phone. Assuming, of course, that you're already locked in one of the prisons their clients operate in Oklahoma.

Introducing a cell phone into a correctional facility used to be a misdemeanor in Oklahoma. Now, it's a felony. This change did not happen for any reason other than a private prison lobbyist provided his client with a good way to make even more revenue off of people already imprisoned. Bumping this crime up from a misdemeanor to a felony means that when a person is caught with a cell phone in prison, he or she will end up staying in prison even longer; in most cases the new sentence will be added to the end of the existing one, instead of allowing people to serve time for both the crime that landed them behind bars and the cell phone infraction simultaneously. More prison time, more profits.

Does it matter that this policy has zero public safety value, as cell phones were already considered contraband behind bars? Not to a private prison company. When a lobbyist approached me on the statehouse steps and said he was pushing for enhanced punishment for having a cell phone in prison, I responded by stating this simply was not smart, evidence-based policy. I haven't seen proof that this type of enhancement, where you convert a misdemeanor to a felony, deters crime. I asked the Governor not to sign the bill, but – after concerted lobbying from the private prison company – he signed it anyway.

And sadly, folks, that is how criminal justice policy gets made. This change in the law was never motivated by a sincere interest in reducing the number of cell phones in correctional facilities. That was just a front. This change was motivated by increasing private prison companies' profit margins.

You can show me any section of the criminal code, and I can tell you the anecdote that put that policy in place. Laws rarely make their way to the books because of research, data analysis or evidence-based best practices. Instead individual financial greed – and not the public interest – is all too often the driving force behind criminal justice policy.

I know. I saw firsthand how illogical criminal justice policies are created as the Director of the Oklahoma Department of Corrections.

Here's how the scheme works: Private prisons create demand for their services much like drug dealers ensure that their customers are addicted, but not so addicted that they die. These companies inject their lobbying dollars and campaign contributions into the political world, contributing to a climate in which no one can be reelected by appearing soft on crime. The result is a machine that passes laws to ensure more and more people flow into prisons, regardless of whether society actually is made better by having these people behind bars.

The bottom line is that private prisons' current business plans simply cannot coexist with meaningful evidence-based sentencing reform. If we want a fair and smart system, we have to cut these dangerous pushers out of the deal entirely.

We need to replace profit-seeking policies with proven, evidence-based ways to end mass incarceration while keeping our communities safe. Here are just a few of the changes we could make right now to pave a path toward a smart and fair criminal justice system:

- Eliminate mandatory minimum sentences.
- Transfer severely and/or chronically mentally ill prisoners to state agencies responsible for mental health treatment.
- Prohibit "lock-up quota" contracts with private prison companies, in which the jurisdiction promises to send enough prisoners to a private facility to meet a "lock-up quota" or pay the company for falling short of the quota.
- Make probation a real possibility for people convicted of non-violent crimes.

CEO profits and shareholder returns have no place in our criminal justice system. Cutting the profit motive out will mean a return on public investment that actually reduces future victimization, breaks inter-generational cycles of incarceration, and reduces pathways to prison.

It's time we valued people and our communities over profits. 🖊️

States Renewing Their Prison Phone Contracts

As state DOCs renew or rebid their prison phone contracts, you can help urge them to lower intrastate phone rates and eliminate commission kickbacks!

The Campaign for Prison Phone Justice needs your help in:

**** Nevada, New Jersey and Vermont ******

The Departments of Corrections in the above states are in the process of re-bidding or renewing their prison phone contracts. Most DOCs receive a commission (kickback) on revenue generated from calls made by prisoners, which results in excessively high phone rates. Although the FCC voted last year to cap the costs of interstate (long distance) prison calls, which went into effect on February 11, 2014, the order does not apply to intrastate (in-state) calls. An estimated 85% of prison phone calls are in-state. This is an opportunity to ask DOCs to forgo commissions and ensure their new prison phone contracts are based on the lowest cost to those who pay for the calls – mostly prisoners' families.

Take Action NOW! Here's What YOU Can Do!

Ask your family members and friends to write, email, call and fax the DOC and the governor's office (addresses and contacts are listed below), requesting that the DOC: 1) forgo commission payments when re-bidding or renewing its prison phone contract, and 2) base the new contract on the lowest calling costs. Lower prison phone rates should apply not just to long distance calls but also to in-state calls. For a sample letter or to easily send an email, visit the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice's website and click on the "Take Action" tab:

"Mass Chaos" Reigns at Georgia Prisons

by David M. Reutter

FIVE FORMER GEORGIA PRISON GUARDS have pleaded guilty and three were convicted by a federal jury in connection with a severe beating that left a handcuffed prisoner hospitalized with acute brain damage. The charges followed state and federal law enforcement investigations into the assault, and the prisoner filed suit due to his injuries.

An advocacy group, meanwhile, has filed a separate lawsuit contending that violence in Georgia's prison system is "spiraling out of control," resulting in "mass chaos."

On August 15, 2012, former state prison guard Darren Douglass-Griffin, 36, a member of the Correctional Emergency Response Team (CERT) at Macon State Prison, pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy to violate the civil rights of a prisoner and falsification of records related to the brutal beating of prisoner Terrance Dean in December 2010. The charges stemmed from an FBI investigation into organized abuse by guards at the facility.

Two other former CERT members at Macon, Emmett McKenzie and Willie Redden, entered guilty pleas in related cases. Douglass-Griffin, McKenzie and Redden remain free on unsecured bonds.

An initial Georgia Bureau of Investigation (GBI) review of the beating incident determined that it started when Dean and guard Stephen Walden quarreled in a prison dorm. Investigators said several prisoners who witnessed the argument reported that Dale and Walden then began fighting in the rear of the dorm.

A group of other guards quickly broke it up, but not before Walden suffered bruises, swelling and a sore jaw. Dean was handcuffed behind his back and dragged to the prison gym, where there were no cameras. Once there, the GBI report said, guards kicked, punched and stomped Dean into unconsciousness.

The beating stopped only after Sgt. Christopher A. Hall physically pulled the guards off Dean. "I was screaming and pushing those guys," Hall told a GBI investigator. "Everything I was doing was to get those guys to stop."

Dean's injuries were so severe – he was temporarily in a coma – that he was first taken to a local hospital and then transferred to a medical facility in Atlanta for more specialized care.

His family learned of his plight only after a prisoner used a contraband cell phone to call Dean's brother. It took the family weeks to obtain even basic facts about his condition. "They covered it up," stated Dean's mother, Willie Maud Dean. "They didn't want us to know what they did to him."

It was not until early January 2011 that Dean's mother was finally able to see him. "He couldn't stand up. He couldn't walk on his own," she said about his injuries. "He couldn't talk. He couldn't use his hands."

The GBI investigated whether Hall's supervisors, Capt. Kevin Davis and Deputy Warden James Hinton, were aware that prisoners were regularly taken to the gym to be beaten. "I'm just trying to find out, in fairness to you, how far up this goes," GBI agent Trebor Randle told Hall in a videotaped interview. "What about the deputy warden? Does he know?"

"Yes," Hall said.

During that interview, Hall also discounted the guards' cover story. For weeks they had claimed that Dean "snatched away" from the guards restraining him, then fell and hit his head as he ran away. The truth, Hall said, was that Dean was taken to the gym – out of sight of security cameras – to be beaten in retaliation for assaulting Walden.

Despite that disclosure, Hall still tried to excuse the actions of his coworkers. "I don't think my guys meant to do it," he said. "It just happened. They just went too far."

Although the GBI filed charges against a number of guards involved in Dean's beating, a state grand jury refused to indict them.

"It's just unfortunate that there was no indictment," observed Dean's attorney, Mario Williams. "It sends a strong message to prisoners all over Georgia that even if GBI believes correctional officers violated the constitutional rights of a prisoner, a grand jury can still come back with no indictment."

The FBI launched its own investigation and found that guards at Macon beat prisoners as punishment for misbehaving. Seven guards, including Hall, were indicted on federal charges that they "conspired to assault inmates, and ... conspired with Deputy Warden Hinton and others to cover up their misconduct by writing false reports and providing misleading information to investigators."

In addition to Hinton and Hall, the federal indictment named Ronald Lach, Jr., Delton Rushin, Kerry Bolden, Derrick Wimbush, Kadarius Thomas and Tyler Griffin.

Hall, a military veteran with a decade of prison experience, initially worked at Macon State Prison, left to work at another facility and then returned to Macon in 2009. He said there was a huge deterioration in conditions following his return.

"The inmates were wild," he stated. "It was a big change. Inmates assaulting the staff everywhere. People scared to come to work. The whole atmosphere was just chaos. All of it."

Hall said the atmosphere negatively impacted staff at the facility. "Everybody's just tired," he said. "Just exhausted, man. Tired and mentally worn out."

When pleading guilty, Douglas-Griffin admitted that he and other guards had beaten three prisoners at Macon in 2010 to punish them, then falsified reports to cover it up.

The admissions by Hall and Douglas-Griffin came as no surprise to Sarah Geraghty, a senior staff attorney with the Southern Center for Human Rights, which filed a lawsuit in 2011 alleging systematic brutality by guards at nearby Hays State Prison, where several prisoners have been killed. [See: PLN, Feb. 2014, p.1].

In fact, according to a legislative hearing held on April 10, 2014, 32 prisoners and one guard have been murdered in Georgia's prison system since 2010 – a significant increase over previous years.

"Too many people have died needless deaths in the DOC in Georgia. One person has died and then the next, without the State making meaningful changes to keep people safe in custody," Geraghty said. "The message communicated is that these are lives that we value less than other lives, and that is very wrong, totally inappropriate, and unacceptable."

"Things seem to be spiraling out of control," she added. "We are seeing mass chaos, essentially, in many of the prisons."

The Southern Center for Human Rights released a report in July 2014 titled "The Crisis of Violence in Georgia Prisons," calling for an investigation by the U.S. Department of Justice. The report cites incidents where prisoners were assaulted by other prisoners with knives, boiling water, broom handles and other weapons.

"People who are supposed to be running our prisons have lost control," said Geraghty. "It appears they either cannot or will not take appropriate steps to address the level of violence."

Terrance Dean filed a lawsuit in U.S.

District Court in August 2012 against Hall, Davis, Hinton and other guards involved in his beating, claiming that the "deliberate, sadistic and malicious" attack was part of a broad pattern of illegal conduct by Macon State Prison employees. The case settled in June 2013 for $350,000. See: Dean v. Douglas, U.S.D.C. (M.D. Ga.), Case No. 5:12-cv-00120-CAR.

Four years after the beating, Dean remains disabled as he serves the rest of his 20-year sentence for armed robbery. Incarcerated at Georgia's medical prison near Augusta, his left foot is still twisted inward and his speech is slurred. He must take anti-seizure medication three times a day and can walk only with the help of a leg brace.

"He's not the brother that went in there," said his older sister, Stephanie Dean.

In June 2014, following a two-week federal jury trial, former Sgt. Hall and guards Ronald Lach, Jr. and Delton Rushin were convicted in connection with Dean's beating. They were all found guilty of obstruction of justice and conspiring to obstruct justice; Lach was also convicted of violating Dean's civil rights.

Two other defendants, Derrick Wim-bush and Tyler Griffin, as well as Deputy Warden Hinton, were acquitted. Griffin and Hinton had been placed on paid administrative leave pending their trial. Previously, Thomas had pleaded guilty in September 2013 while Bolden pleaded guilty in January 2014.

"Eight former corrections officials from Macon State Prison now stand convicted for their involvement in beating inmates and in the coordinated cover-ups that followed each assault," stated Acting Assistant Attorney General Jocelyn Samuels. "These officers betrayed the public trust by using their official positions to commit violent civil rights abuses and then tried to cover up their crimes."

None of the guards who pleaded guilty or were convicted have been sentenced. ■

Temple University Acts on Complaint Against Authors of Private Prison Study

IN RESPONSE TO AN ETHICS COMPLAINT filed against Temple University professors Simon Hakim and Erwin A. Blackstone, a Temple official wrote in July 2014 that she had examined the complaint and the University took action as a result.

The complaint, filed in June 2013 by PLN managing editor Alex Friedmann, noted that when Hakim and Blackstone initially released the results of their research – which found substantial cost savings and comparable quality of service by privately-operated prisons – their working paper failed to disclose they had received funding from the nation's three largest private prison companies. [See: PLN, June 2013, p.32].

Further, Hakim and Blackstone wrote editorials published in newspapers in at least five states regarding their research, most of which did not disclose the funding source of their study. Friedmann wrote counter-editorials, four of which were published.

The ethics complaint argued that the professors' failure to adequately disclose their private prison study had received funding from the private prison industry violated several University policies related to academic research. The complaint also noted the study relied upon American Correctional Association (ACA) standards to evaluate quality of service at private prisons without disclosing the close financial and leadership connections between the ACA and private prison firms.

For example, the complaint stated: "The ACA essentially sells accreditations of correctional facilities, as accreditation is only provided for a fee amounting to thousands of dollars per facility.... not only does the ACA receive accreditation fees from privately-operated facilities (as it does from government-run facilities), but private prison firms serve as sponsors of the ACA's biannual conferences and run paid advertisements in ACA publications." Further, "there is some overlap between the ACA and the private prison industry with respect to personnel: Daron Hall, the ACA's immediate past president, is a former CCA program manager, while at least two CCA officials, former Vice President Dennis Bradby and CCA warden Todd Thomas, have served as ACA auditors. Thomas is additionally a member of the ACA's legislative committee and, notably, CCA Vice President Harley Lappin chairs the ACA's standards committee."

The ethics complaint filed against professors Hakim and Blackstone resulted in news coverage by a variety of media agencies, including the Philadelphia Inquirer, Philadelphia Weekly, Inside Higher Ed and In These Times, as well as The Temple News, the University's paper.

A number of groups contacted Temple University concerning the ethics complaint and private prison study, including a letter from three Philadelphia-based locals of the American Federation of State, County & Municipal Employees (AFSCME). In addition, more than a dozen organizations, including the Pennsylvania Institutional Law Project, National Lawyers Guild and Southern Center for Human Rights, submitted a joint letter to Temple regarding the study and ethics complaint in May 2014; the letter was coordinated by In the Public Interest.

Dr. Michele Masucci, Interim Vice Provost for Research at Temple, stated in a July 2, 2014 letter that she had concluded an examination of Friedmann's complaint.

"As you know," she wrote, "the working paper was withdrawn and is no longer widely available. Additionally, University records do not reveal that it received grant funds" for the private prison study, and thus "many months ago we directed that correction be made to any publication that inaccurately attributed Temple's connection to this work."

Further, Dr. Masucci stated the University would "address its conclusions, including any action specific [sic] pertaining to the respondents, individually with Drs. Hakim and Blackstone."

Temple University did not release the results of its investigation into the ethics complaint, however, or disclose any action taken against the authors of the private prison study. "It's a personnel matter. I can't go into details," said Temple spokesman Brandon Lausch. "We concluded our examination of the matter with the professors and addressed it," he added.

"Although it took Temple officials over a year to act on my ethics complaint, I'm pleased that they realized the serious nature of the complaint and disassociated the University from the private prison study, and that the working paper was withdrawn," said Friedmann. "Of course, it would have been better had Temple released the results of its investigation, such as whether Hakim and Blackstone owned stock in the private prison firms that funded their study. It's ironic that the University has not fully disclosed the outcome of its investigation into my complaint against two of its faculty members who failed to fully disclose the source of their research funding."

ColorOfChange, the nation's largest online civil rights organization, has launched a campaign targeting Hakim and Blackstone's study, using the tag line: "The best research money can buy?"

Meanwhile, U.C. Berkeley researcher Christopher Petrella issued an open letter debunking some of the flawed methodology of Hakim and Blackstone's research, and called on Corrections Corporation of America to stop citing their study. CCA and private prison firm GEO Group – both of which funded the study, along with Management & Training Corp. – have incestuously cited it in their promotional materials, on their websites and in public statements.

Efforts to urge Temple University to release the results of its investigation into the ethics complaint, and to adopt a policy requiring disclosure of corporate funding at all stages of the research publication process, remain ongoing. ■

U.S. Sentencing Commission Approves Retroactivity for Drug Offense Sentence Reductions

by Derek Gilna

IT'S ALWAYS HARD FOR THE FEDERAL government to admit its mistakes, especially when they have ruined tens of thousands of lives, devastated inner-city neighborhoods and cost taxpayers billions of dollars. But a recent vote by the U.S. Sentencing Commission to make sentence reductions for certain non-violent drug offenders retroactive is certainly a step in the right direction.

The Commission's July 18, 2014 decision will affect an estimated 20% of federal prisoners and thousands of defendants currently awaiting sentencing, by making retroactive a two-level reduction "in the sentencing guideline levels applicable to most federal drug trafficking offenders." The Commission had voted in April to lower the sentencing guideline levels.

"This amendment received unanimous support from commissioners because it is a measured approach," remarked Sentencing Commission Chairwoman Patti B. Saris. "It reduces prison costs and populations, and responds to statutory and guidelines changes since the drug guidelines were initially developed, while safeguarding public safety."

According to Families Against Mandatory Minimums (FAMM), over 65,000 people submitted public comments to the Commission in support of applying the sentence guideline reductions retroactively.

"This is a milestone in the effort to make more efficient use of our law enforcement resources and to ease the burden of our overcrowded prison system," said Attorney General Eric Holder, Jr., who had originally sought a more limited change to the sentencing guidelines.

U.S. Senator Patrick Leahy, one of the co-sponsors of the Smarter Sentencing Act of 2014 (S.1410), a bill pending in Congress that would provide additional sentencing relief, commented that the Commission's vote was "an important step toward responsibly addressing our unsustainable prison population."

Unless Congress acts to block the Sentencing Commission's decision, eligible prisoners can begin filing motions to reduce their sentences starting November 1, 2014. Even if such motions are granted, however, no offenders will be released until at least one year after that date. The delay will give the Bureau of Prisons and the federal courts time to prepare for a flood of prisoners petitioning for reduced prison terms.

"More than 46,000 offenders would be eligible to seek sentence reductions in court," the Commission announced. "These offenders' sentences could be reduced by 25 months on average."

With certain exceptions, the sentencing guideline changes will only apply to federal prisoners convicted of specified drug offenses whose base offense level was 13 to 37; they will not affect those who are serving mandatory minimums or were sentenced as career offenders.

Further, the Sentencing Commission's retroactivity decision will not be an automatic process, just as sentence reductions for crack cocaine offenses were not automatic under the Fair Sentencing Act of 2010. [See: PLN, Sept. 2010, p.26]. The Commission's order is still subject to interpretation by the courts, which will decide if prisoners seeking relief are eligible for sentence reductions.

"Each drug offender is going to have to be evaluated individually in order to determine whether or not as a result of dangerousness or otherwise his or her sentence should be reduced," said Commissioner and U.S. District Court Judge Ketanji Jackson. ■

Ninth Circuit: Prisoner's Service of Process for Other Prisoner Not Protected Conduct

by Mark Wilson

ON SEPTEMBER 10, 2013, THE NINTH Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the dismissal of a prisoner's retaliation claim, holding that serving a summons for another prisoner is not constitutionally protected conduct.

Hawaiian prisoner Richard H. Blaisdell was incarcerated at the Saguaro Correctional Center, a prison in Arizona operated by Corrections Corporation of America (CCA). Since 2007 he has filed at least three lawsuits against prison officials.

On April 23, 2008, Blaisdell asked CCA classification supervisor Christina Frappiea to notarize a document for a lawsuit he planned to file against the facility. When she finished, Blaisdell announced that she had been "served" and handed her an unrelated summons and federal civil complaint prepared by another prisoner, Anthony Gouveia.

The complaint concerned Frappiea's refusal to notarize a document related to a lawsuit Gouveia had filed in Mississippi. Blaisdell was not a party to that suit and had agreed to serve process for Gouveia.

Blaisdell and Frappiea argued about whether he had the right to serve her. She then issued disciplinary reports against Blaisdell, charging him with "Conspiracy" for agreeing to possess Gouveia's summons and complaint, "Failure to Follow Rules" by possessing another prisoner's property and "Violation of Federal, State or Local Laws" for failing to comply with Arizona's legal requirements for process servers and the Prison Litigation Reform Act's screening provisions of 28 U.S.C. § 1915A prior to attempting service.

A CCA disciplinary hearing officer found Blaisdell guilty of the charges and imposed a sanction of 60 days in administrative segregation.

Blaisdell filed suit in Arizona state court, but the case was removed to federal court. He alleged the discipline was retaliatory and sought damages totaling $10,000.

On initial screening, the district court interpreted Blaisdell's claim as alleging retaliation for having attempted to serve Gouveia's lawsuit, as well as a claim that "Frappiea had prepared the disciplinary charge 'to get even' with Blaisdell for his own prior lawsuits against CCA and its officers."

The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants, concluding that Blaisdell's service of process was not constitutionally protected conduct. It also noted that Blaisdell had expressly disclaimed that the retaliation was due to his own litigation activity.

The Ninth Circuit affirmed, first rejecting Blaisdell's attempt to void his statement waiving his own prior litigation as the reason for retaliation by Frappiea.

The appellate court then found that

Blaisdell was not engaged in protected conduct when he attempted to serve Gouveia's complaint. Resolving that issue required it "to wade into doctrinal waters not often explored in detail by courts."

The Court of Appeals rejected Blaisdell's argument that his conduct was protected by his constitutional right "to pursue 'litigation-related activities.'" The appellate court held that "while Gouveia and Blaisdell each have an access-to-courts right to file litigation from prison, they cannot vicariously assert that protection on each other's behalf."

Relying on Johnson v. Avery, 393 U.S. 483 (1969), Blaisdell argued that he had a right to provide "affirmative legal assistance to his fellow inmate." The Court of Appeals disagreed, finding that "close inspection of Johnson and its progeny illustrates that... Blaisdell misconceives the true nature of the right to assistance." In Johnson, prison officials "failed to provide any other mechanism for helping inmates who were incapable of preparing legal papers themselves." In contrast, CCA's policy "provides for a law library and for contract attorneys or paralegals." Blaisdell did not challenge the sufficiency of either, and acknowledged that the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provide for alternative methods of service.

Based on Rizzo v. Dawson, 778 F.2d 527 (9th Cir. 1985), Blaisdell also contended that his conduct was protected by "the freedom of association for the advancement of beliefs and ideas" recognized in NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415 (1963).

The Ninth Circuit found Rizzo was not controlling because Blaisdell had not engaged in the kind of activity which Rizzo held was protected. It also refused to extend Rizzo to service of process.

Although the appellate court did not – and could not – overrule Rizzo, it wrote that "its holding is difficult to square with the Supreme Court's subsequent teachings on prisoners' rights."

In conclusion, "Because of questions about Rizzo's vitality, the general incompatibility between prison and free association, and because there is no evidence of expressive association," the Court of Appeals held "that the First Amendment does not protect Blaisdell's attempted service of process on Frappiea." See: Blaisdell v. Frappiea, 729 F.3d 1237 (9th Cir. 2013). ■

Texas Correctional Industries: Providing Useful Work Skills or Slave Labor?

WITH FACTORIES EMPLOYING MORE than 5,000 prisoners at 37 facilities, mostly in the eastern part of the state, Texas Correctional Industries (TCI) is a large and diversified operation. However, critics question the relevance of the job skills that prisoners learn, and even TCI has acknowledged slow progress in modernizing its industry programs.

Established by state law in 1963, TCI manufactures a wide selection of goods that range from furniture and garments to refurbished computers. TCI also operates soap and detergent factories, metal fabrication facilities, sign shops, and boot and shoe manufacturing plants, and produces bedding, janitorial supplies, Texas state flags and, of course, license plates. Industry programs also include tire repair and retreading, printing services, renovating school buses and Braille transcription.

TCI provides goods and services to “city, county, state and federal agencies, public schools, public and private institutions of higher education, public hospitals and political subdivisions.”

Critics claim that many of the job skills learned by prisoners in TCI industry programs will be virtually useless after they’re released because they involve outdated techniques or industries that are scarce in Texas. For example, there are relatively few soap and detergent plants or flag manufacturers in the state. Or license plate factories.

Those supportive of TCI counter that the most important skill learned may simply be how to keep a job, because 40% of the prisoners who work in TCI programs have never been employed outside of prison. Additionally, TCI’s Offender Work & Training Programs Division offers opportunities for eligible prisoners to “learn specialized, technical job skills and earn national certifications,” according to the agency’s website.

One TCI operation that encompasses modern technology is the computer recovery program, consisting of two computer repair labs – one at the Wynne Unit in Huntsville and the other at the Daniel Unit in Snyder. Prisoners repair, refurbish or recycle up to 125 tons of computers and electronic equipment each month.

“You can tell the age of the computers by how yellow they are,” said TCI computer repair shop supervisor Bob Stoudt, who noted that many schools are desperate to keep old computer systems in working condition because they are unable to afford new ones.

TCI boasts that it “benefits the state of Texas by generating cost savings by providing quality products and services to the Texas Department of Criminal Justice and other eligible agencies and political subdivisions of the state.”

But complaints about the program center on the long hours worked by prisoners, often in industries that do not translate to marketable job skills, for no pay while under the watchful eye of prison guards and the threat of discipline if they do not work. Critics say such an artificial environment is hardly a model for success in the job market outside prison.

Only a small number of Texas prisoners receive wages for their labor – those who participate in the TCI’s Prison Industry Enhancement (PIE) Certification Program, a partnership between the Texas Department of Criminal Justice and private companies. Prisoners employed in PIE programs manufacture goods that are sold on the open market.

Two PIE programs, both based at the Lockhart Unit, produce AC parts and heating valves for Henderson Controls, Inc., and computer boards and wire harnesses for OnShore Resources. As of December 31, 2013, a total of 110 Texas prisoners were employed in PIE programs (around 2% of TCI workers), earning wages that range from $7.78 to $10.28 per hour.

According to TCI, deductions are withheld from the paychecks of PIE workers for “taxes, room and board, dependent support, restitution, and a contribution to a crime victims’ fund.” The PIE program was implemented in Texas in 1993 and, since then, nearly $20 million has been returned to the state through deductions from prisoners' wages.

Prison manufacturing has a long history in Texas. The first Texas prison was opened in Huntsville in 1849; four years later, it had been equipped with a textile plant where prisoners could process 500 bales of cotton and three tons of wool per year. In the modern version of that industry program, today Texas prisoners manufacture tens of thousands of shirts and pairs of socks, pants and underwear each month in TCI textile factories, which significantly reduces clothing expenses for the state prison system.

Still, critics maintain that TCI uses prisoners as the equivalent of unpaid slave workers who toil under the constant threat of punishment, which reduces the likelihood that such industry programs will convert them into competent, motivated employees following their release. The best that can be hoped, opponents argue, is that some prisoners might learn good work habits, such as showing up for their jobs on time and putting in a full day's labor. ■

South Carolina Supreme Court Reverses Parole Denial

by Michael Brodheim

THE SUPREME COURT OF SOUTH CAROLINA, exercising the sort of common sense not found in the courts of more "liberal" states like California, held on July 3, 2013 that retroactive application of a law that increases the requirements for parole constitutes an ex post facto violation. In so holding, the Court reversed a denial of parole by the Board of Probation, Parole and Pardon Services (Board).

In 1982, after pleading guilty to one count of murder, Thelma Barton was sentenced to life in prison. Beginning in 1997, her application for parole was denied 13 times.

In January 2012, four of the six Board members participating in Barton's parole hearing voted in favor of granting her parole. Ultimately, however, parole was denied because, in the Board's view, section 24-21-645 of the South Carolina Code requires a two-thirds majority vote of the Board's seven members (i.e., five votes rather than four) before parole may be granted in cases involving violent crimes. The Board cited the "nature, seriousness, and indication of violence of her offense" in denying Barton parole.

Barton appealed the decision, arguing the Board had violated her constitutional rights by not applying the version of section 24-21-645 in effect at the time she committed her offense. That version required only a simple majority (rather than a two-thirds majority) of the Board members to vote in favor of granting parole. In the alternative, Barton argued she had satisfied the current statutory requirements for parole because two-thirds of the Board members who participated in her hearing had voted to grant parole.

The Administrative Law Court affirmed the Board's decision.

The state Supreme Court reversed on appeal, agreeing with both of Barton's arguments in a lengthy and detailed ruling.

"Simply put, prior to the [statutory] amendment, Appellant merely needed to obtain favorable votes from a majority of the Parole Board," the Court wrote. "Following the amendment, Appellant must obtain favorable votes from two-thirds of the Parole Board. This amendment is not procedural, but poses a sufficient risk of increasing the measure of punishment attached to Appellant's crime and other similarly situated individuals."

The Supreme Court concluded "that retroactive application of section 24-21-645 constitutes an ex post facto violation, and inmates convicted of a violent crime must only convince two-thirds of the Parole Board members participating in their hearing. Appellant received the requisite number of votes from the Parole Board, and thus, should be granted parole." See: Barton v. South Carolina Department of Probation, Parole and Pardon Services, 404 S.C. 395, 745 S.E.2d 110 (S.C. 2013). ■

Update on PLN Suit Against Nevada DOC

PRISON LEGAL NEWS CONTINUES ITS efforts to defend its First Amendment right to communicate with prisoners in the Nevada Department of Corrections (NDOC). In 1999 the NDOC banned all copies of PLN, claiming the publication constituted “inmate correspondence.” PLN filed suit and was granted a preliminary injunction requiring delivery of PLN subscriptions and mail to Nevada prisoners. The state entered into a consent decree in September 2000, agreeing that prisoners “shall be permitted to subscribe to the publications of their choice,” subject only to specified security concerns.

However, ongoing censorship of PLN’s monthly magazine and books resulted in a June 2013 lawsuit in which PLN seeks to enjoin the unconstitutional censorship of its publications by prison officials. [See: PLN, Nov. 2013, p.18]. In conjunction with the lawsuit, PLN also filed a motion for an order to show cause in the prior suit, seeking to hold the NDOC in contempt for violating provisions of the 2000 consent decree by enacting and enforcing policies that continue to censor PLN’s monthly publication and book orders sent to Nevada prisoners. The federal district court later consolidated the two cases.

On June 17, 2014, the NDOC filed a motion to dismiss PLN’s suit, claiming a revised mail policy (AR 750) resolved any constitutional issues with the old mail policy. The court has not yet ruled on the motion; a jury trial in the case is scheduled for January 27, 2015. See: PLN v. Cox, U.S.D.C. (D. Nev.), Case No. 3:00-cv-00373-HDM-WGC.

PLN relies on information we receive from prisoners to assist us in our litigation, and we invite Nevada readers to contact us concerning censorship of mail and books at NDOC facilities. Specifically, whether prisoners receive notice when mail is withheld or censored, whether they have participated in an appeals process, and if they are receiving book orders without “pre-approval.” Nevada prisoners can contact us in these regards at: Prison Legal News, Attn: NV DOC Suit, P.O. ## ACLU Granted Preliminary Injunction Requiring Michigan Jail to Deliver Legal Mail

by David Reutter

AFEDERAL DISTRICT COURT IN MICHIGAN granted a preliminary injunction that requires officials at the Livingston County Jail (LCJ) to deliver letters sent by the ACLU to specific prisoners and to return the mail if a prisoner is no longer in custody. The defendants appealed and the Sixth Circuit declined to stay the injunction.

The ACLU filed a lawsuit in March 2014, which was assigned as a companion case to Prison Legal News v. Livingston County Sheriff Bob Bezotte, U.S.D.C. (E.D. Mich.), Case No. 2:11-cv-13460-DPH-MAR. [See: PLN, Sept. 2011, p.19].

Both PLN and the ACLU are challenging the constitutionality of the LCJ’s postcard-only mail policy. The ACLU alleged that jail officials violated the First Amendment by blocking and reading its letters sent to prisoners; it also asserted due process violations.

While the LCJ’s mail policy includes procedures for legal mail, the ACLU said the jail “does not allow ACLU attorneys to write letters to inmates regarding the constitutionality of the conditions of confinement including letters that would address the constitutionality of the postcard-only policy itself.” Additionally, LCJ officials failed to “notify either the ACLU or the inmates to whom the legal mail is addressed that the mail was not being delivered to its intended residents and ... opened, read, and shared the legal mail sent by an ACLU attorney to an inmate who no longer resides at the jail.”

In an effort to obtain information from prisoners concerning the jail’s postcard-only policy, the ACLU had sent 25 letters clearly marked “Legal Mail” to individually-named LCJ prisoners. The letters and a form to complete and return to the ACLU were received at the jail on or about February 21, 2014. No responses were received.

In a deposition taken in PLN's case, an LCJ official testified that the jail does not "deliver mail sent by an attorney to an inmate unless the mail is sent by the inmate's 'attorney of record' on an ongoing court case." Further, mail from lawyers outside the county who write to four or five prisoners and letters from attorneys that the LCJ considers to be a "mass mailing" are not delivered. Finally, a letter sent by the ACLU to a prisoner no longer housed at the LCJ was opened, read and scanned, and sent to an attorney representing the jail. That attorney then filed the letter in a pleading entered on the court's public docket.

LCJ officials claimed the ACLU was trying to "solicit inmates for the furtherance of [its] own political agenda."

The ACLU moved for a preliminary injunction to protect its First Amendment right to communicate with prisoners at the jail, and the motion was granted in May 2014.

"A prisoner's interest in unimpaired, confidential communication with an attorney is an integral component of the judicial process and mail from an attorney implicates a prisoner's protected legal mail rights," the district court wrote. See: ACLU of Michigan v. County of Livingston, U.S.D.C. (E.D. Mich.), Case No. 2:14-cv-11213-DPH-RSW.

The defendants filed an interlocutory appeal and requested a stay of the court's order. The Sixth Circuit denied the motion for a stay on July 10, 2014 after considering "the same four factors a district court considers when granting a preliminary injunction."

Citing Procurier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396 (1974), rev'd in part on other grounds, Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401 (1989), the Court of Appeals wrote that "[b]oth parties to the correspondence have an interest in securing [the communication], and censorship of the communication between them necessarily impinges on the interest of each."

The Sixth Circuit noted that unlike mail from private attorneys and courts, it had "never squarely addressed whether mail from the ACLU is 'legal mail.' But, on balance, our precedent suggests that it would be, provided that it is from a licensed attorney and designated as privileged information. The envelopes in this case contained clear statements that they were from a licensed Michigan attorney and that they were legal mail."

Concluding the defendants would not be irreparably harmed if they were required to deliver the ACLU's letters sent to individual prisoners and to return (rather than opening and reading) mail addressed to prisoners no longer held at the LCJ, the Court of Appeals denied a stay of the district court's preliminary injunction order. See: ACLU of Michigan v. County of Livingston, Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals, Case No. 14-1617.

The lawsuits filed against the LCJ by Prison Legal News and the ACLU of Michigan both remain pending. ■

Reversal of Oregon Parole Postponement Due to Incorrect Psychological Evaluation

by Mark Wilson

THE OREGON COURT OF APPEALS HAS held that a prisoner's release was improperly postponed for two years on the basis of an erroneous psychological evaluation report.

Oregon law provides for enhanced "dangerous offender" sentences upon a finding that a defendant suffers "from a severe personality disorder indicating a propensity toward criminal activity." The Board of Parole & Post-Prison Supervision (Board) then establishes a parole consideration hearing date rather than a parole release date.

If the Board finds at a parole consideration hearing that the condition which made the prisoner dangerous is absent or in remission, it must order the prisoner's release. If the condition is found to still be present, the Board may postpone parole consideration for a minimum of two years and a maximum of 10 years.

To assist the Board in making this determination, prisoners are compelled to submit to psychological evaluations by Board-contracted psychologists who are paid for each evaluation. Independent evaluations typically cost $1,500 to $3,000.

Some Board-contracted psychologists interview the prisoner while others don't. Some administer psychological testing, others don't. Some review the prisoner's file and some don't. The prisoner has no right to see a particular doctor or to insist that the evaluation process meet any minimal standards for completeness or reliability. If the prisoner refuses to submit to an evaluation, the Board may postpone parole consideration for ten years or require the prisoner to serve until his or her good time date, which amounts to life without parole in some cases.

The Board does not meet with the psychological examiners or call them to testify at parole consideration hearings, "because this a hearing, not a trial," said former Board Chairman Steven Powers. Rather, the Board simply relies upon the evaluation report.

Although the Oregon Supreme Court has held that prisoners have a protected liberty interest in their parole release dates and the postponement of release constitutes a "substantial deprivation of liberty," the Board maintains a blanket ban on witnesses, prohibiting prisoners from calling their own witnesses or confronting or cross-examining the Board-contracted psychologists about the content of their reports.

In 1988, Nghia Gia Dam was convicted of 15 counts of first-degree robbery and sentenced as a "dangerous offender." The Board established a September 3, 2008 parole consideration date and ordered Dam to submit to a psychological evaluation by Board-contracted psychologist F. Robert Stuckey.

Stuckey's evaluation consisted of an interview with Dam and a review of the written record, including a presentence investigation report (PSI) and a report of Dam's conduct while incarcerated.

The PSI that Stuckey relied upon contained numerous significant factual errors. It reported that Dam had a 1975 criminal conviction in the U.S., even though he had first entered the country in 1980. It also incorrectly listed seven prior criminal convictions and dispositions that were not a part of Dam's criminal history, including three drug convictions, two domestic violence convictions (when he had only one), a theft conviction and a conviction for DUI.

Stuckey was not aware of the errors. Instead, in his psychological evaluation report he made several references to, and emphasized, the erroneous information as evidence that Dam was "minimizing" his criminal behavior, which supported his conclusion that Dam "did not appear to have a mature, sophisticated, or remorseful attitude regarding his criminal behavior." Based on that incorrect information, Stuckey found "there was much blame, avoidance, and minimization, and lack of depth understanding with respect to his criminal behavior."

Ultimately, Dr. Stuckey concluded that Dam had "a present severe emotional disturbance such as to constitute a danger to the health and safety of the community."

The Board considered Stuckey's report at Dam's September 3, 2008 parole consideration hearing. Dam objected to the Board's use of the report due to its reliance on the incorrect PSI information. Nevertheless, the Board relied on Stuckey's report to conclude that Dam remained a danger, and postponed his release for two years.

Dam appealed, objecting to the use of Stuckey's report because it was based on incorrect criminal history information in his PSI. The Board denied Dam's appeal, stating, "the Board discussed your concerns about the inaccurate information used by Dr. Stuckey, and present in your presentence investigation, acknowledged the errors and disregarded that information in its own deliberations, as well as taking the matter into account when considering Dr. Stuckey's conclusions."

Although the Board stated it had "taken steps to ensure that the erroneous information is removed from the written record for future hearings," it did "not find that the errors significantly prejudiced [Dam] or caused the psychological evaluation to be unreliable."

Rather, the Board noted that Stuckey gave examples of Dam's statements to support his conclusion that Dam minimized his criminal conduct. It also found independently of Stuckey's evaluation, based upon its own questioning and observation of Dam, that he minimized his criminal conduct.

The Court of Appeals reversed. While it held that "the question is a close one" and there was "evidence at the hearing that supports findings that [Dam] minimizes his crimes and shows little insight into how his criminal acts affected the victims," the appellate court noted that "Stuckey referred repeatedly to [Dam's] criminal history."

"It is impossible to determine the extent to which Stuckey's ultimate conclusion was influenced by the incorrect information in the PSI and by his perception that [Dam] was not being truthful," the Court of Appeals concluded.

"[I]t is clear that the board relied on Stuckey's flawed evaluation," the Court wrote. However, "it is not clear that the board would have reached the same conclusion in the absence of its reliance on the flawed report." As such, the appellate court concluded "that the board's affirmative determination that [Dam] continues to be dangerous is erroneous," and remanded the case for reconsideration. See: Dam v. Bd. of Parole & Post-Prison Supervision, 258 Ore. App. 39, 309 P.3d 161 (Or. Ct. App. 2013). ■

Qualified Immunity to Iowa DOC Director for Recalculating Prisoners' Release Dates

by David M. Reutter

THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS has upheld a district court's grant of qualified immunity in a civil rights action brought by four ex-prisoners who were held beyond their release dates.

The prisoners, Richard Scott, Tim Burney, Kevin Underwood and J'Won Wilder, filed a lawsuit under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 against Iowa Department of Corrections (IDOC) director John R. Baldwin, seeking monetary and injunctive relief. They alleged that Baldwin had failed "to timely recalculate the end dates" of their sentences following the Iowa Supreme Court's decision in Anderson v. State, 801 N.W.2d 1 (Iowa 2011). In that case, the Court held that Iowa law requires prisoners to receive credit for time served "for supervision of services."

Within weeks of the Anderson ruling, Baldwin knew it would impact "approximately 3,444 offenders." Working some overtime, the IDOC began recalculating each prisoner's release date. The first affected prisoner was freed on August 26, 2011; through December 8, 2011, the IDOC released more than 200 prisoners. The plaintiffs served between 43 and 60 days beyond their release dates.

While it was undisputed that the plaintiffs were held beyond the end of their sentences, the issue was whether Baldwin "reasonably could have believed" the time spent recalculating prisoners' release dates after the ruling in Anderson was "lawful in light of clearly established law on the totality of the circumstances."

The Eighth Circuit noted that Baldwin knew which prisoners were affected by Anderson, but did not know when to release them without recalculating their sentences. The plaintiffs did not allege that Baldwin had been notified they were being over-detained, or that he detained them after he was aware of their new release dates.

Established law imposed a "duty to investigate" upon Baldwin, but there was no authority regarding the time he had to recalculate the plaintiffs' sentences. "Under the circumstances," the appellate court concluded, "the law did not fairly warn him that the amount of time spent recalculating thousands of release dates, including the plaintiffs', recklessly disregarded their constitutional right to release." As such, Baldwin was entitled to qualified immunity. See: Scott v. Baldwin, 720 F.3d 1034 (8th Cir. 2013). ■

Seventh Circuit: Routine Erasure of Prison Security Tapes Does Not Warrant Sanctions

by Michael Brodheim

THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT HAS HELD THAT a district court did not abuse its discretion when it denied a prisoner's motion for sanctions based on the erasure of prison security tapes that allegedly would have provided evidence in support of the prisoner's claim that he had been subjected to excessive force. The appellate court held that sanctions are warranted only when evidence is destroyed in bad faith, i.e., "for the purpose of hiding adverse information," and that there was no evidence that the disputed videos had been destroyed for reasons other than routine prison policy.

Larry Bracey, incarcerated at the Wisconsin Secure Program Facility, was injured during an altercation with guards in July 2005. The incident was recorded by prison security cameras but the video footage was erased when the cameras recorded over it about three days later.

Bracey filed suit in 2010, alleging that the guards had used excessive force against him in violation of the Eighth Amendment. As the trial approached he filed a motion for sanctions, arguing that he was entitled to an adverse inference jury instruction because the security tapes of the incident had not been preserved by prison officials, which, he claimed, constituted spoliation of evidence.

The district court denied Bracey's motion because "none of the individual defendants were involved in the decision not to preserve the video."

Bracey lost at trial and appealed. The Seventh Circuit affirmed, declining Bracey's invitation that it join several other circuits – including the Sixth and Ninth – in adopting a standard that would not condition an adverse inference instruction on a showing of bad faith.

The Court of Appeals also rejected Bracey's challenge to the district court's denial of his motion to appoint counsel, even though the defendants had refused to produce certain documents in discovery due to "security" concerns which could have been produced had he been represented by counsel. The appellate court noted that Bracey had other options, including a renewed motion for appointment of counsel and motion to reopen discovery, which he did not pursue. See: Bracey v. Grondin, 712 F.3d 1012 (7th Cir. 2013), rehearing denied, cert. denied. ■

Fifth Circuit Grants Summary Judgment for Substitution of Pain Medication

THE FIFTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS has reversed a denial of summary judgment against jail medical officials who substituted ibuprofen for Percocet when treating a prisoner's gunshot wound.

On September 12, 2008, Ronnie Burton was shot in the shoulder during a drive-by shooting. He was taken to a hospital, treated, admitted for a day, prescribed Percocet for pain and released. He was then arrested and taken to the Hinds County Detention Facility in Raymond, Mississippi, where he remained until he was released two days later. During his stay at the jail, Burton was denied Percocet and instead given 800mg of ibuprofen twice a day for pain. He alleged that was insufficient and he remained in pain.

Burton filed suit in state court alleging a violation of his Fourteenth Amendment right to medical care as a pretrial detainee. The case was removed to federal court. The defendants filed a motion for summary judgment, alleging their actions did not violate Burton's rights; the district court denied summary judgment to two medical officials at the jail, who filed an interlocutory appeal.

The Fifth Circuit noted that medical care standards for pretrial detainees under the Fourteenth Amendment are virtually identical to those used for convicted prisoners under the Eighth Amendment. It held that the reasonableness of the defendants' conduct depended on "the severity of the gunshot wound and the comparative abilities of ibuprofen and Percocet to manage pain." However, Burton had failed to introduce any evidence as to those issues.

Therefore, the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law even when the evidence was viewed in the light most favorable to Burton, accepting his claim that he complained to the medical officers that the ibuprofen was ineffective and he remained in pain. The district court's judgment denying qualified immunity was reversed, and Burton's petition for a writ of certiorari was denied in October 2013. See: Burton v. Owens, 511 Fed.Appx. 385 (5th Cir. 2013), cert. denied. ■

Heat-related Deaths in Texas Prisons Lead to Lawsuits, Reluctant Changes

by Matt Clarke and David M. Reutter

PRISONERS ACROSS THE NATION ARE currently experiencing the oppressive heat of summer – particularly in the Southern states. Those incarcerated in Texas, however, have not just been sweating due to high temperatures. They have been dying.

Since 2007 at least 14 prisoner deaths in Texas have been linked to sweltering conditions during brutal summers. Prisoners who suffer from obesity, diabetes and high blood pressure, and those taking psychiatric medications, are especially susceptible to high levels of heat. But despite the fatalities – and resultant lawsuits – until recently the Texas Department of Criminal Justice (TDCJ) has done little to prevent prisoners from literally baking to death.

Such stonewalling has persisted in spite of a federal Court of Appeals ruling that found exposing prisoners to dangerously high temperatures may violate the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment. Unlike correctional facilities in many other states, most Texas prisons are not air conditioned – only 21 of 111 TDCJ facilities have full climate control, while others have air conditioning only in certain areas such as medical units.

In a rare and unusual display of unity, the union representing Texas prison guards has sided with prisoners, arguing that the excessive heat creates a hazardous work environment for line staff while wardens sit in cool, comfortable offices and even prison armories are air conditioned.

And while Texas lawmakers posture that the tax-paying public opposes providing prisoners with air conditioning, the TDCJ has added insult to injury by allocating three-quarters of a million dollars to construct climate-controlled barns for hogs the prison system raises ... using prisoner labor, of course.

Lawsuit Seeks Relief

IN THE MOST RECENT LEGAL CHALLENGE to the stifling conditions in Texas prisons, four prisoners at the Wallace Pack Unit filed suit in federal court on June 18, 2014, seeking relief from the oppressive heat that turns metal-lined cell blocks into ovens. The plaintiffs, who suffer from medical conditions or disabilities aggravated by high temperatures, allege they are being subjected to inhumane conditions. See: Bailey v. Livingston, U.S.D.C. (S.D. Texas), Case No. 4:14-cv-01698.

"It is a concrete, persistent, well-known danger – summer comes every year, and every year, people die," said Brian McGiverin, an attorney with the Texas Civil Rights Project (TCRP), which represents the prisoners.

"I don't know if I will make it this summer," stated Marvin Yates, 69, one of the four plaintiffs in the case. Yates has chronic obstructive pulmonary disease (COPD) and hypertension. "The heat and humidity are so bad I have trouble breathing," he said. "The metal tables in the dorms are too hot to touch and feel like they can burn your skin."

"The prisoners need the Court to stop TDCJ from subjecting them to these extremely high temperatures because Pack is a geriatric unit that has hundreds of inmates over age 60, and hundreds more that suffer from heat-sensitive medical conditions like asthma, diabetes and COPD," said attorney Jeff Edwards, the lead attorney in the lawsuit. "TDCJ knows the temperatures at Pack place these prisoners in danger but rather than cool the housing areas or move the prisoners to safe locations, TDCJ plays Russian roulette with their health."

The lawsuit asks the court to order the TDCJ to reduce temperatures to a maximum of 88 degrees – the threshold established by a federal court in Louisiana in December 2013 for a unit housing death row prisoners in that state. The suit also seeks class-action status.

"Unlike many problems facing the prison system, this is one that can be easily fixed," Edwards observed. "According to medical experts, TDCJ could eliminate nearly all heat-related illnesses that happen inside its housing areas by simply reducing the heat index to 88 degrees or below."

Edwards said it was no coincidence that one day after the Texas Civil Rights Project issued a press release announcing the lawsuit, the news media reported the TDCJ had taken steps to reduce high temperatures in prisoner living areas at seven units.

Jay Eason, the TDCJ's deputy director of prison and jail operations, said the purchase of 28 Cool-Space evaporative coolers at a cost of $1,800 each was "just something we thought we would try." He added, "This year we purchased close to 700 additional fans for offender housing and work areas."

Study Finds Dangerous Heat Conditions

THE TCRP LAWSUIT WAS FILED TWO months after the release of a study by the University of Texas School of Law's Human Rights Clinic that found high heat and humidity, combined with a lack of policies to protect prisoners from life-threatening conditions, violate the Eighth Amendment and international human rights standards.

The April 2014 study, "Deadly Heat in Texas Prisons," noted that of the 14 prisoners who died from heat-related causes since 2007, 13 suffered from medical conditions or were taking medication that rendered them heat-sensitive. However, the TDCJ had no policy for identifying heat-sensitive prisoners and housing them in climate-controlled prisons. Five of the six facilities where the prisoners died were built within the last 30 years, yet none provide a way to control excessively high temperatures in prisoner housing areas.

The heat index, a standard that measures the impact of severe heat – a combination of actual air temperature and relative humidity, or how hot it feels – is set by the National Weather Service. For example, a heat index of 103 degrees or higher carries a classification of "extreme caution," "danger" or "extreme danger." Extreme caution means that heat exhaustion is possible; the chance is greater on danger days, and heat exhaustion is probable on extreme danger days. Heat exhaustion can result in mental confusion, sweating, headaches, nausea and fatigue. Left untreated it may progress to heat stroke, a condition that can lead to organ failure and death.

According to the Human Rights Clinic study, TDCJ guards routinely log temperatures and humidity that drive the heat index into extreme caution, danger and extreme danger levels. For example, the 10:30 a.m. reading at the Hutchins Unit on July 19, 2011 indicated an air temperature of 112 degrees, humidity of 65% and a heat index of over 149 degrees – far into the extreme danger range.

“TDCJ takes precautions to help reduce heat-related illnesses such as providing water and ice to staff and offenders in work and housing areas, restricting offender activity during the hottest parts of the day, and training staff to identify those with heat-related illnesses and refer them to medical staff for treatment,” said TDCJ spokesman Jason Clark.

“The response that their policies are adequate today is ridiculous,” countered TCRP attorney Brian McGiverin. “They know well that people are dying from heat in their prisons. If they don’t feel that they have a problem with their policies that simply means that they don’t care that people are dying.”

Water coolers filled with ice can quickly run dry and, in any case, don’t go far in a housing unit with 150 or more prisoners; further, permitting extra showers is a policy that never seems to be followed. Thus, some prisoners strip down to their underwear and lie on the concrete floor in an effort to stay cool.

The TDCJ does use large fans to circulate air in housing areas, but such measures may actually increase the danger from oppressive heat. According to the Centers for Disease Control, “fans will not protect a person from heatstroke or heat-related illness when temperatures are above 90°F and humidity is above 35%. In fact, using fans in extremely hot and humid conditions may actually increase heat stress on the body.”

Appellate Court Ruling and More Lawsuits

THE HUMAN RIGHTS CLINIC REPORT added weight to a recent decision by the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, which held that exposing prisoners to extreme temperatures “can constitute a violation of the Eighth Amendment.”

On July 30, 2012, the Fifth Circuit issued an unpublished ruling in a lawsuit brought by former Texas prisoner Eugene Blackmon, who claimed that prison officials “did not take constitutionally adequate measures to address the extremely high temperatures in his dormitory during the summer of 2008, exposing him to substantial health risks. Blackmon contended that he was particularly susceptible to the effects of the heat because, during the relevant time of his confinement, he was 63 to 64 years old and took prescription medication for pre-existing high blood pressure.”

The district court had granted judgment as a matter of law to the TDCJ defendants, and the Court of Appeals reversed and remanded for a new trial. The appellate court concluded that “when viewed in the light most favorable to Blackmon, the evidence presented at trial would allow a reasonable jury to conclude that the extreme heat in Blackmon’s dorm caused substantial health risks to Blackmon – a prisoner who, according to testimony presented at trial, was especially susceptible to the health risks of extreme heat because of his advanced age, pre-existing high blood pressure, and use of prescription medication.” See: Blackmon v. Garza, 484 Fed.

Following remand, the case settled in January 2013 for $8,000. Blackmon was represented by the Texas Civil Rights Project.

In June 2012, the TCRP filed suit over the wrongful death of prisoner Larry Gene McCollum, 58, at the Hutchins State Jail in Dallas. McCollum suffered from diabetes and hypertension, and weighed 345 pounds. The cause of his death was hyperthermia; when he was taken to a hospital, his body temperature was reportedly 109.4 degrees. The case remains pending. See: McCollum v. Livingston, U.S.D.C. (N.D. Texas), Case No. 3:12-cv-02037-L.

The TCRP also filed wrongful death lawsuits in federal court on June 13, 2013 against the TDCJ and University of Texas Medical Branch on behalf of the families of four prisoners who died due to heat-related causes – Douglas Hudson, Kenneth Wayne James, Rodney Adams and Robert Allen Webb. Hudson, James and Adams had died at the Gurney Unit, while Webb died at the Hodge Unit. All had medical conditions that made them more susceptible to high temperatures. The lawsuits remain pending, and the TDCJ defendants filed an interlocutory appeal to the Fifth Circuit in July 2014. See: Adams v. Livingston, U.S.D.C. (E.D. Texas), Case No. 6:13-cv-00712-KNM.

“These men were the weakest of the weak,” stated Texas Civil Rights Project attorney Jeff Edwards. “TDCJ knew putting men with these medical conditions in temperatures this high could kill them, but they did it anyway.”

“My dad was supposed to go to jail for four years for drunk driving and the temperatures were so bad that he couldn’t survive four days,” said Ashley Adams, whose father, Rodney, died a day after suffering convulsions. He had a body temperature of 107.9 degrees. Court records include an account from a hospital doctor who said Rodney was “perfectly well” until he was exposed to “extremely hot conditions within the holding tank” at the prison.

“No one deserves to die like that,” Ashley said.

Kenneth Wayne James, 52, was just a few months from release when he was discovered dead in his cell with a body temperature of 108 degrees on August 13, 2011. An autopsy found his death was due to “environmental hyperthermia-related classic heat stroke.”

Albert Hinojosa died at the Garza West Unit in Beeville, where the windows are sealed shut and the “prison housing areas are like an oven,” his mother, Ramona Hinojosa, wrote in a federal lawsuit filed against the TDCJ and prison and medical officials. An autopsy determined that Albert had died from hyperthermia; the suit remains pending. See: Hinojosa v. Livingston, U.S.D.C. (S.D. Texas), Case No. 2:13-cv-00319.

Politics as Usual and an Unlikely Ally

RAMONA HINOJOSA SAID TEXAS LAWMAKERS are well aware of the problem, noting that state Rep. Sylvester Turner sent a letter to TDCJ executive director Brad Livingston in 2011 “expressing his concern about the high temperatures in TDCJ prisons, that ‘temperatures inside cells have reached as high as 120 degrees during the day and do not fall below 100 degrees at night.’”

But according to Hinojosa’s lawsuit, TDCJ officials consider air conditioning a “waste of money.” The cost of installing air conditioning in prison units has been estimated at $55 million, and there is no apparent support among legislators to provide that funding.

“We need to have a grownup discussion of what’s practicable and reasonable and what’s politically acceptable. But I can tell you, the people of Texas don’t want air conditioned prisons,” said state Senator John Whitmire, who chairs the Senate Criminal Justice Committee. “These people are sex offenders, rapists, murderers,” he added. “And we’re going to pay for their air conditioning when I can’t go down the street and provide air conditioning to hard-working, taxpaying citizens?”

Whitmire’s political posturing does not take into consideration the options available to Texans who are not incarcerated. Prisoners can’t open a window or go outside to cool off. They can’t go to a convenience store for a cold drink, or take a shower when they want to, or go to a mall or library that has air conditioning. Some don’t even have a fan in their over-heated cells.

The complaints raised by prisoners have garnered support from an unlikely ally – the union representing Texas prison guards. In a November 21, 2013 editorial in The New York Times, Lance Lowry, president of the Huntsville, Texas-based local of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME), condemned the scorching conditions inside TDCJ prisons – especially in light of the agency’s highly-publicized and much-criticized effort to provide climate-controlled housing for the hogs it raises.

“In August, right around the time when the Texas summer heat was at its brutal worst, the state’s prison system finalized a bid to replace its aging swine-production facilities with six new climate-controlled modular barns, at a cost of $750,000,” Lowry wrote.

“The pigs raised for inmate consumption were going to get relief from the heat, but the state’s inmates would continue to suffer. In the last six years, at least 14 inmates died from heat stroke or hyperthermia in overheated Texas prisons, where air conditioning is scarce and temperatures can reach 130 degrees.”

Why the interest by prison employees? They are adversely affected by the heat, too. In 2012, 92 TDCJ workers suffered heat-related illness or injuries. Another 55 heat-related injuries and illnesses were reported by guards in the first eight months of 2013. Between 2011 and 2013, TDCJ employees filed 162 heat-related workers’ compensation claims.

“The correctional officers, whose working conditions are the same as the inmates’ living conditions, have taken note,” Lowry stated. “Several inmates’ families have filed wrongful death lawsuits, and the officers’ union supports them. We also support those officers who plan to take legal action against the state because of intolerable heat in their workplace.”

Lowry noted that union officials had complained about dangerous temperatures in Texas prisons for over 15 years, to no avail. “I’ve seen some of my co-workers pass out from the heat,” he said.

“Texas needs to ensure humane conditions for the inmates who live in prisons and the officers who work there,” Lowry concluded. “After all, people shouldn’t be treated worse than the livestock.”

“It is outrageous that TDCJ would prioritize the safety of pigs for slaughter over the lives of human beings,” said former TCRP attorney Scott Medlock.

“TDCJ has literally made the decision that protecting its bacon is more important than protecting human lives.”

Litigation as a Solution

IN A PRELUDE TO WHAT MAY OCCUR IN Texas, as noted above, a lawsuit filed by death row prisoners at the Louisiana State Penitentiary resulted in a December 2013 federal district court order requiring the state to “develop a plan to reduce and maintain the heat index ... at or below 88 degrees Fahrenheit.” The court found that high temperatures at the prison constituted cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment.

In May 2014, the district court approved the defendants’ heat remediation plan and appointed Paul J. Herbert as a Special Master to oversee ongoing compliance with the plan. The defendants have appealed the order to the Fifth Circuit. See: Ball v. LeBlanc, U.S.D.C. (M.D. La.), Case No. 3:13-cv-00368-BAJ-SCR.

Courts have also ruled on heat-related conditions in prisons and jails in Arizona, Wisconsin, Georgia, Delaware, New York and Illinois. [See, e.g.: PLN, Jan. 2006, p.38].

Such legal challenges are not always successful, though. “Florida death row prisoners filed a suit over excessive heat a few years ago and lost,” said PLN editor Paul Wright. “But as a practical matter, except for some former Confederate states in the South, like Florida and Texas, [that] deliberately do not air condition their prisons to make a sadistic point, the rest of the country has heated and air conditioned prisons for both the prisoners and staff.”

Ironically, Texas law requires county jails to maintain temperatures between 65 and 85 degrees, but the statute does not apply to state prisons.

“In fact, if one of these counties chose to act like TDCJ and not air condition its jails, it would be breaking the law,” said Ranjana Natarajan, a clinical professor at the University of Texas School of Law. “TDCJ must be held to the same standard.”

“If TDCJ officers locked a dog in a hot car, they would go to prison for animal cruelty,” added Scott Medlock. “Doing this to human beings, no matter what crime they were convicted of, is unconscionable.”

Although heat-related deaths among

Texas prisoners have received recent attention by the news media, they have been a long-standing problem. In November 1998, in an article titled “Texas Prisoners Bake to Death,” PLN reported on three prisoners who died due to excessively high temperatures – one on death row and two in transport buses.

Ultimately, the pending lawsuits against the TDCJ over heat-related deaths and injuries may achieve the necessary reforms that Texas prison officials and lawmakers lack the human decency and political will do to themselves. ■

ICE Officials Target of Sexual Harassment, Gender Discrimination Lawsuits

ACCUSATIONS OF SEXUAL HARASSMENT and anti-male bias at the highest levels of the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) bureau resulted in a shakeup at the agency and two federal lawsuits, one of which settled for $175,000.

On September 1, 2012, Suzanne Barr, a longtime aide to Janet Napolitano when she was governor of Arizona, resigned her position as chief of staff to ICE Director John Morton after a coworker alleged in a lawsuit that Barr had created a sexually-charged “frat house” workplace environment – accusations that Barr dismissed as “unfounded and without any merit” and “designed to destroy my reputation.”

“I feel it is incumbent upon me to take every step necessary to prevent further harm to the agency and to prevent this from further distracting from our critical work,” Barr said in her resignation letter. She had been on voluntary leave since James T. Hayes, Jr., the former director of ICE’s detention and deportation operations in Washington, D.C., filed suit in May 2012.

Hayes’ lawsuit claimed that Barr told a male subordinate at an office party that he was “sexy” and asked about the length of his penis. Soon after she took the chief-of-staff position in 2009, Barr supposedly offered to perform oral sex on a male employee during a business trip in Bogota, Colombia, and later phoned a male subordinate from her hotel room and again offered to perform oral sex.

Hayes also accused Napolitano, who served as Secretary of the U.S. Department of Homeland Security during President Obama’s first term in office, of pushing him out of his job to bring in Dora B. Schriro, the former director of Arizona’s state prison system. Schriro later left ICE and currently serves as commissioner of the Connecticut Department of Emergency Services and Public Protection.

Hayes alleged that Schriro was less qualified than him for a job as Napolitano’s special advisor on immigrant-removal procedures, but Schriro was given the position because she “enjoyed a longstanding relationship” with Napolitano.

The lawsuit preceded another complaint filed against Napolitano in July 2012 by ICE staffer Jason Mount, who claimed he was denied 43 promotions because he’s a white male. Mount, who was promoted to branch chief at ICE headquarters in Washington in October 2009 before filing a gender discrimination complaint a year later, stated he was eventually forced to commit “career suicide” by taking an ICE position in Boston that he said was a “downgrade” in rank and pay.

A federal official told the New York Post that those allegations “do not align with the fact that Mr. Hayes routinely held high-ranking assignments, including his current position as special agent in charge of ICE’s second-largest field office.”

As the salacious details in Hayes’ and Mount’s lawsuits were being reported, Napolitano told the Arizona Republic in August 2012 that she was considering going back to Arizona, where she had served as the state’s attorney general and governor.

Hayes’ lawsuit settled in November 2012 for $175,000, and Napolitano subsequently left her post as Secretary of the Department of Homeland Security in 2013. She currently serves as president of the University of California.

The district court in Mount’s employment discrimination lawsuit issued a ruling on April 10, 2014 dismissing several of his claims because “the applicable legal standards regarding administrative exhaustion were not satisfied.” Another claim was allowed to proceed, and the case remains pending. See: Mount v. Johnson, U.S.D.C. (D. D.C.), Case No. 1:12-cv-01276-KBJ.

Washington Jail Detainees Sue over Videotaped “Peep Shows”

by Mark Wilson

“THEY WERE DIRECTING THEM TO DO it like dolls. Like taking clothes off a Barbie doll,” stated Seattle, Washington attorney James C. Egan, referring to a pattern of videotaping female detainees in holding cells at the Puyallup City Jail as they undressed and used the toilet.

In 2011, Egan noticed that his DUI clients were routinely forced to strip at the jail, even when they were being released. Surveillance video he obtained through public records requests confirmed his suspicions. The videos, which were readily available to anyone making a records request, revealed a “significant pattern” of women prisoners being forced to strip naked, change clothes or use the bathroom in areas under video surveillance.

Guards orchestrated “peep shows,” Egan alleged. One woman said jail staff ordered her to undress in what she believed was a private cell. After changing into a uniform, a guard forced her to strip again.

“An officer came in and says something to her and she takes her jail pants off and then her panties,” said Egan. “I thought, ‘this has got to stop.’”

In August 2013, eleven women and one man arrested on misdemeanor DUI charges who were videotaped in holding cells at the jail sued the city, the police chief and a lieutenant. The lawsuit, filed in state court, alleged that jail staff violated the plaintiffs’ civil rights and privacy by filming them as they disrobed and used the toilet. The plaintiffs, represented by Egan, were not identified in the complaint.

“Plaintiffs had a reasonable expectation of privacy which was violated by their having been secretly videotaped in assorted states of undress. It is believed that officers may have committed this offense for the purpose of obtaining arousal or personal gratification,” the lawsuit stated.

Some of the women who were videotaped said they felt “sickened” and taken advantage of, calling the guards “peeping toms” and “perverts.” One of the plaintiffs said jail guards made comments like, “I love red heads” and “You have a nice body.”

“It was one of the worst experiences of my life because of how mean and rude they treated me,” said another plaintiff. “I am absolutely horrified and violated. I honestly can’t believe it. I had no idea there were cameras around. The fact those are supposed to be police officers upholding our justice system while violating it is absolutely disgusting.”

The defendants, of course, saw things much differently.

“The tactics that Mr. Egan uses are slimy,” stated Puyallup City Attorney Kevin Yamamoto, adding, “Mr. Egan does not have the best interest of these folks at heart” – apparently because he “cherry-picked” defendants who had the most compelling video footage from the holding cells.

Yamamoto did not address whether the practice of filming detainees while they were undressing and using the bathroom also was “slimy.” Instead, he defended the videotaping as necessary to ensure security at the jail.

“While at first blush it may seem a little intrusive to have a safety camera monitoring a holding cell, there are numerous reasons why these cameras are present,” the Puyallup Police Department wrote in a statement on August 22, 2013, when the suit was filed.

“In our view, Mr. Egan’s claims are completely baseless,” added Puyallup Police Captain Scott Engle.

In a phone interview with PLN, Egan said the city made two mistakes – they placed cameras in areas at the jail where detainees had an expectation of privacy, and the video footage was recorded and stored, making it available to the public through public records requests. He also noted that, ironically, while his clients had been jailed on misdemeanor DUI charges, the offense of voyeurism in Washington state is a felony.

The lawsuit was removed to U.S. District Court, and on July 7, 2014 the court ruled on the defendants’ motion to dismiss and the parties’ cross-motions for partial summary judgment. The court dismissed claims for voyeurism, invasion of privacy under the state’s Public Records Act and violation of a state law related to strip searches (RCW 10.79).

The defendants noted that as of December 13, 2013, the jail no longer recorded video footage from the holding cells, and that all preexisting footage had been destroyed except the videos introduced as evidence in the lawsuit. The district court ordered those videos sealed, and the case remains pending. See: K.S. v. City of Puyallup, U.S.D.C. (W.D. Wash.), Case No. 3:13-cv-05926-RJB. ■

Physician Sentenced for Sexually Abusing Prisoners in Georgia, District of Columbia

ON AUGUST 28, 2012, DR. LEWIS Jackson, 37, was indicted by a federal grand jury for sexually abusing prisoners at the United States Penitentiary (USP) in Atlanta, Georgia. The alleged abuse occurred while Jackson was out on bond pending trial for sexually assaulting a prisoner at the District of Columbia Jail.

Dr. Jackson was employed at USP Atlanta, a medium-security male-only prison with an associated minimum-security satellite camp, from January 2011 through July 2012. The indictment alleged that during the course of medical examinations in October 2011, Jackson tried to perform oral sex on three prisoners. He also allegedly attempted to engage in anal sex with one of the prisoners.

Prior to his employment at USP Atlanta, Jackson performed contract work at the D.C. Jail. When he was arrested in Atlanta, he was out on bond on charges of sexually abusing a prisoner at the D.C. Jail in 2008.

A federal grand jury for the Northern District of Georgia indicted Jackson on three counts of sexually abusing a ward and one count of lying to federal agents related to the offenses at USP Atlanta.

Dr. Jackson pleaded guilty to the federal charges and was sentenced in February 2013 to 25 months in prison and two years of supervised release. See: United States v. Jackson, U.S.D.C. (N.D. Ga.), Case No. 1:12-cr-00287-AT-AJB.

Jackson also pleaded guilty to the D.C. charges, and was sentenced in November 2013 to five years in prison and ten years of supervised release for one count of second-degree sexual abuse. He was further required to register as a sex offender and undergo a mental health evaluation and treatment, and lost his medical license.

"He used his position to prey upon the most vulnerable population – inmates – and sexually abuse these men," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Peter V. Taylor, who called Jackson a "sexual predator."

In March 2014, former federal prisoner Howard Brons filed suit alleging that he was sexually abused by Jackson during a clinic visit at USP Atlanta. Another prisoner, Julius Leroy Harrison, had filed a similar suit in December 2012, alleging that Jackson threatened he would tell guards that Harrison was trying to escape unless he allowed him to perform a sex act. Harrison's pro se lawsuit was later dismissed. ■

Failure to Treat Tuberculosis Suit Survives Summary Judgment, Settles for $1.4 Million

by Derek Gilna

IN JANUARY 2013, THE U.S. DISTRICT Court for the Western District of Washington denied a motion for summary judgment filed by the Bureau of Prisons (BOP), seeking qualified immunity in a Bivens lawsuit brought by Jermaine E. Satterwhite, a federal prisoner at FDC Seatac. Satterwhite claimed that prison medical staff had failed to treat his latent tuberculosis infection (LTBI) in violation of the Eighth Amendment.

The district court noted that although a Tuberculin Skin Test, or TST, given to Satterwhite upon his admission to FDC Seatac in 2008 was negative for active tuberculosis, it revealed an 18-millimeter induration that indicated symptoms of latent TB. Tuberculosis has been widely recognized as a serious and potentially fatal disease, particularly in crowded environments such as correctional facilities.

However, prison medical officials "did not discuss LTBI treatment with Satterwhite, did not refer him to a physician to be considered for treatment, and did not record anything ... regarding treatment or follow-up monitoring." Even after he developed a "severe cough," Satterwhite did not receive treatment for LTBI.

He was eventually transferred to a hospital where he was diagnosed with "a lesion in his right lung, enlarged lymph nodes, lytic bone lesions, a compression fracture of one of Satterwhite's vertebra caused by an epidural mass compressing the spinal cord, and a lesion in the first lumbar vertebra – all found to have been caused by untreated, widespread tuberculosis." As a result, he had two spinal surgeries and is now partially paralyzed.

In its program statements and medical treatment guidelines, the BOP outlines a series of tests and procedures for active and latent symptoms of TB, and Satterwhite established that those procedures were not followed in his case. The district court found the claims alleged in his complaint satisfied both the objective and subjective prongs for an Eighth Amendment violation, and held a court "may infer the existence of [deliberate indifference] from the fact that the risk of harm is obvious," citing Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730 (2002).

The district court also rejected the BOP's qualified immunity defense, finding "the relevant, dispositive inquiry in determining whether a right is clearly established is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted." Here, where BOP procedures and accepted medical practices were not followed, qualified immunity was not available.

The court concluded by stating: "A reasonable physician's assistant, with the authority and responsibility the Court must infer ... would have known that doing nothing in the face of [Satterwhite's LTBI] 'posed such a substantial risk of serious harm that [it] would be constitutionally impermissible.'" See: Satterwhite v. Dy, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9178 (W.D. Wash., Jan. 23, 2013).

The BOP appealed the district court's summary judgment order but settled the case before the Ninth Circuit issued a ruling. As part of the July 11, 2013 settlement, the BOP defendants agreed to pay $1.4 million to Satterwhite, with each party to bear their own costs and attorney's fees. Satterwhite was represented by Seattle attorneys Michael E. Withey and Joanne R. Werner. ■

Prison Phone Justice Project needs your help for statewide campaign!

While much progress has been made in reducing the costs of long distance prison calls, we are still fighting to reduce the high costs of in-state prison and jail calls at the local level. In January 2014, the Human Rights Defense Center (HRDC), the parent organization of Prison Legal News, reopened its Seattle office to launch the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign.

This is our first statewide phone justice campaign, and we're excited to have people involved on both the local and national levels who are dedicated to ending the exorbitant phone rates and kickbacks associated with the prison phone industry. We have already been obtaining the phone rates and contracts from all 39 county jails in the state and the Washington DOC.

We hired a local campaign director, Carrie Wilkinson, who manages our office in Seattle and is coordinating the statewide campaign. Washington prisoners and their families pay some of the highest phone rates in the nation, and we need your help to win this battle!

Here's how you can help – first, please visit the campaign website:

There you can see all the ways you can make a difference. The site allows you to sign up for the campaign and upload videos and share blog entries about how high prison phone rates make it difficult for you to stay in touch with your incarcerated loved ones. You can even call in your story to 1-877-410-4863, toll-free, at any time! We need to hear how you and your family have been affected by high prison and jail phone rates. If you don't have Internet access, you can mail us a letter describing your experiences. Send letters to HRDC's main office at: HRDC, Attn: WA Phone Justice Campaign, P.O. Box 1151, Lake Worth, FL 33460. Washington state prisoners can send a copy of this notice to their family members so they can get involved.

We especially need copies of telephone bills that show prison and jail phone charges!

By choosing to participate in the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign, you will be playing a key role in ending the unfair phone rates that prisoners' families have to pay. We cannot win this battle without your help, so please visit the campaign website and share your experiences! Donations are also welcome and greatly appreciated, and can be mailed to the above address or made online via the campaign website. Thank you for your support!

Washington Prison Guard's Murder Costs State $2.5 Million and Counting

by Mark Wilson

A WASHINGTON PRISONER'S CONVICTION and death sentence for murdering a female prison guard has cost taxpayers $1.6 million, while the guard's family settled a lawsuit against the state for $900,000.

As previously reported in PLN, convicted rapist Byron Scherf, 55, lured state prison guard Jayme Biendl, 34, into the chapel at the Monroe Correctional Complex, and strangled her to death with an amplifier cord on January 29, 2011. Her body was not found until two hours later. [See: PLN, Jan. 2012, p.38].

Ironically, prior to her death, Biendl had warned officials at the prison about security deficiencies such as insufficient lighting, poor radio communication and a lack of surveillance cameras. Her complaints were ignored.

Scherf, who had spent most of his adult life in prison and was already serving life without parole, confessed to ambushing and murdering Biendl. He said he had attacked her due to something she said to him, which he refused to divulge. "She didn't deserve to die. She didn't deserve that," Scherf told investigators.

He went to trial and on May 9, 2013 a jury convicted him of aggravated murder; he was subsequently sentenced to death.

The bill has now come due. In July 2013, Snohomish County officials, including the sheriff, prosecutor, medical examiner, superior court clerk and jail officials, billed the state more than $900,000 for Scherf's prosecution.

Pursuant to state law, defendants facing the death penalty must be assigned two "death qualified" attorneys, and Scherf was represented by defense counsel Karen Halverson and Jon Scott. They billed the state nearly $400,000 for 4,100 hours of work on the case, according to records obtained by The Daily Herald.

Monroe law enforcement officials have also billed the state almost $300,000 for their investigation of Biendl's murder. Detectives interviewed more than 100 guards, prisoners and other witnesses, collected evidence in the prison chapel and reviewed surveillance footage. Two detectives also assisted prosecutors during the trial.

In total, Scherf's prosecution cost Washington taxpayers $1.6 million. Still, that represents only the beginning of many more years of expenses to come.

Scherf now joins eight other prisoners on death row at the Washington State Reformatory in Walla Walla at an average cost of $122 per day, according to Washington Department of Corrections (DOC) spokesman Chad Lewis.

Under state law, the Washington Supreme Court conducts a mandatory review of all death penalty convictions and sentences, plus Scherf will have several other state and federal appeals. Most of his neighbors on death row have been there for more than a decade, and taxpayers will foot the bill for his incarceration while he exhausts the appeals process.

Further, in January 2014, Biendl's family sued the DOC and former Monroe Correctional Complex superintendent Scott Franks. The suit, filed in Snohomish County Superior Court, accused the state of failing to protect Biendl due to "highly predictable" security lapses at the facility. The case settled for $900,000, according to a March 2014 news report.

Following Biendl's death, three guards were fired and other prison employees were disciplined for violating policy, falsifying documents and lying to investigators. The terminated guards were later reinstated following a decision by an arbitrator, who found widespread problems at the prison had contributed to the murder and it was unfair to single out specific staff members.

Franks, meanwhile, was promoted to the DOC's deputy director of prisons. ■

Lethal Injection Protocol, Source of Execution Drugs Challenged in Pennsylvania

A LONG-STANDING FEDERAL CLASS-action lawsuit is challenging the constitutionality of Pennsylvania's execution protocol, and one of the issues in the case involves the use of lethal injection drugs obtained from a compounding pharmacy.

The execution drugs used by the Pennsylvania Department of Corrections (PDOP) are made-to-order from a compounding pharmacy. Compounding pharmacies mix medications to order on site; they are largely free of Food and Drug Administration (FDA) quality assurances that apply to standardized drugs. Instead, they are regulated by state law. They also have a history of quality control problems.

For example, a scandal that involved cancer patients receiving chemotherapy drugs containing only a fraction of the proper dosage caused the Missouri State Board of Pharmacy to test drugs from compounding pharmacies from 2006 to 2009. It found 20% of the pharmacies failed the tests, with dosages ranging from zero to 450% of the correct amount. The Austin American-Statesman reported that compounding pharmacies did not deliver drugs of proper dosages in one-third of tests conducted in Texas. Plus a compounding pharmacy in Massachusetts was at the center of a fungal meningitis outbreak in 2012 that killed 48 people.

However, obtaining lethal injection drugs from compounding pharmacies circumvents import restrictions imposed by overseas manufacturers that do not allow their drugs to be used in executions. [See: PLN, July 2013, p.22; June 2011, p.1]. Thus, it's little wonder that PDOP officials would seek out such drugs and fight strenuously to keep the source of the state's execution drugs secret.

The PDOP ignored two federal court orders to divulge the source of its drugs; prison officials complied only when the imposition of sanctions was imminent. They then tried to keep the proceedings in the class-action lawsuit closed to the public. U.S. District Court Judge Yvette Kane denied the request because the case presented "issues of greater interest to the public."

On November 5, 2012, the PDOP disclosed that it obtained its lethal injection drugs from compounding pharmacies, and that one of the drugs came from a pharmacy which has had two disciplinary cases filed against it. But the quality of the drugs used in executions isn't the only issue.

David Waisel, an anesthesiologist at Boston Children's Hospital, testified that the PDOC's color-coding of its lethal injection drugs differs from the standardized color codes in the medical industry. One drug, pentobarbital, has a standard yellow label. Execution team members with medical experience could be inclined to use that drug first.

The problem, however, is that in the PDOC's execution protocol the yellow label is actually used to designate the second drug, pancuronium bromide – a muscle relaxant that renders the person paralyzed. Waisel testified that if that drug was administered first, the prisoner would experience “extraordinary suffering” but could not communicate the pain they felt due to the paralytic effect.

While that problem could be solved with meticulous training on the execution protocols, sworn statements from members of the execution team stated they were not trained in the use of the color-coded lethal injection syringes.

The PDOC defendants in the class-action suit filed a motion for summary judgment on May 24, 2013; most of the pleadings in the case related to the state's lethal injection protocol have been filed under seal, and the case remains pending. See: Chester v. Beard, U.S.D.C. (M.D. Penn.), Case No. 1:08-cv-01261-YK.

Pennsylvania has conducted three executions since 1976, most recently in 1999, while six Pennsylvania prisoners sentenced to death have been exonerated.

Death row prisoners in a number of other states have challenged the drugs used in lethal injections, as well as the secrecy surrounding the types of execution drugs and where they are obtained. [See: PLN, March 2014, p.46; Aug. 2012, p.17].

On July 22, 2014, the U.S. Supreme Court rejected a challenge to the execution protocol used in Arizona, overturning an appellate ruling requiring the state to disclose details about how the execution would be carried out. Attorneys for Joseph Rudolph Wood, 55, had contended that he had a right to know the qualifications of the members on the execution team and where the lethal injection drugs had been obtained, and that the state's failure to provide that information violated his First Amendment rights. See: Wood v. Ryan, Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, Case No. 14-16380; 2014 U.S. App. LEXIS 13867 (9th Cir. Ariz. July 19, 2014).

“Prisoners who are sentenced to death for their crimes have every right to know what drugs are going to be used,” said Stephanie Grisham, a spokesperson for the Arizona Attorney General's office. “But it would be a bad matter of policy if the manufacturer of these drugs were identified.”

Wood was executed by lethal injection on July 23, 2014. The state used the drugs midazolam and hydromorphone, and it took Wood almost two hours to die. Witnesses reported that he snorted and gasped for air for 90 minutes; one reporter said Wood “gulped like a fish on land.” Prison officials contended they had done nothing wrong, and Governor Jan Brewer said Wood had died “in a lawful manner.”

It is unknown whether Arizona officials had obtained the state's execution drugs from a compounding pharmacy. ■

Cover-up of Angola Prisoner's Beating Results in Guilty Pleas, $8,000 Settlement

THREE LOUISIANA PRISON OFFICIALS have pleaded guilty to federal charges related to their role in the beating of a prisoner at the Louisiana State Penitentiary in Angola.

The incident occurred on January 24, 2010, when prisoner Roy H. McLaughlin, Jr. escaped from his assigned location and was apprehended shortly afterwards, still on the prison's property. When Major Kevin L. Groom, Sr., 45, arrived at the scene, McLaughlin was handcuffed behind his back and in the custody of two other guards in the back of a truck.

One of three high-ranking officials present grabbed McLaughlin's head and slammed it against the truck; in a subsequent lawsuit, McLaughlin claimed the official who slammed his head was Warden Burl Cain. The two guards in the back of the truck also assaulted McLaughlin. Groom was ordered into the truck to escort McLaughlin to the medical unit; during the trip, the two other guards struck and kicked McLaughlin while he lay on his stomach handcuffed.

According to McLaughlin, he suffered contusions and a broken toe; he had tried to escape from Angola twice before the January 2010 incident.

Of the three guards in the truck, Groom had the highest rank. As part of his plea agreement, he admitted that he did nothing to stop the assault. He also conceded that during an investigation into the incident he wrote and submitted a false report and provided false information to the FBI.

Groom entered his guilty plea in December 2012 to charges of falsification of records in a federal investigation and making a false statement to the FBI.

"Law enforcement officers often act as our heroes in protecting us every day; so, when some violate their duties to the public, it is a sad day," said U.S. Attorney Donald J. Cazayoux, Jr. "They must and will be held accountable, and this plea is a step forward in securing justice in this case."

In May 2013, another former Angola officer, Lt. Col. Jason Giroir, 35, pleaded guilty to federal charges of falsifying documents and lying to the FBI. He was accused of participating in the attempted cover-up but had not assaulted McLaughlin.

Most recently, on June 24, 2014, Captain Mark Sharp, 33, pleaded guilty to civil rights violations in connection with the incident. Sharp admitted that he repeatedly hit McLaughlin with a baton during the drive to the medical unit.

Neither Groom, Giroir or Sharp have been sentenced as this issue of PLN goes to press. McLaughlin settled his lawsuit for $8,000. See: McLaughlin v. Cain, U.S.D.C. (M.D. La.), Case No. 3:10-cv-00583-JTT-JDK. ■

Fifth Circuit Upholds Qualified Immunity in Medical Neglect Death of Texas Detainee

by Matt Clarke

IN A CASE INVOLVING THE DEATH OF A pretrial detainee due to lack of medical treatment, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals upheld a district court's order granting qualified immunity to a contract doctor at a county jail and to the county itself.

When Jason Ray Brown, 26, was booked into jail in Wichita County, Texas in July 2004, he told the booking officer that he suffered from autoimmune chronic hepatitis, enlarged veins in the lower esophagus, anemia, jaundice and an enlarged spleen, and that he was under the care of a medical specialist. An hour later he complained of vomiting a small amount of blood.

Licensed vocational nurse (LVN) Michelle George obtained a list of Brown's medications from his pharmacist, but was told by her supervisor, LVN Rose Ingram, not to order any medication until Brown was seen by the jail's contract physician, Daniel Bolin.

Just before midnight the next day, Brown vomited a large amount of blood. He told a jailer that he had gastric ulcers and had received 27 units of blood due to internal bleeding within the previous six months. The jailer called LVN Kay Krajca, who told him to give Brown a dose of liquid antacid per Dr. Bolin's standing orders.

Soon afterwards, other prisoners told the jailer that Brown was complaining he was in a great deal of pain. Called at home, Krajca said Brown should receive a phenegan suppository for his nausea, per the standing orders. Jailers who arrived to administer the suppository around 2:25 a.m. discovered Brown "moaning and incoherent." This time when they called Krajca she agreed to return to the jail.

After Krajca arrived, she had Brown transferred to a medical cell where he was allegedly monitored from time to time through a slot in the door. He was later discovered without a pulse; responding emergency medical technicians said he had been dead quite some time. An autopsy reported his death was due to a massive gastrointestinal hemorrhage.

Brown's parents filed suit against the county, sheriff, jailers, medical staff and Dr. Bolin under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, with pendant state negligence claims. They alleged the defendants were deliberately indifferent to Brown's serious medical needs in violation of his due process rights. The district court granted qualified immunity to the sheriff, which was affirmed on appeal. See: Brown v. Callahan, 623 F.3d 249 (5th Cir. 2010).

Dr. Bolin and Wichita County then moved for reconsideration of their summary judgment motions based on qualified immunity, citing the Court of Appeals' decision in favor of the sheriff. The district court granted their motions for qualified immunity, and the plaintiffs appealed.

The Fifth Circuit noted that Krajca "undoubtedly acted with deliberate indifference to Brown's medical needs," and that "[a]s a pretrial detainee, Brown had a clearly established Fourteenth Amendment right not to be denied medical care as a result of deliberate indifference."

Brown's parents alleged that Dr. Bolin was "allowing the LVNs to medicate detainees from the standing orders requiring them to perform medical care beyond their professional training," and intimidated nurses who either called him for medical assistance at night or had prisoners transported to a hospital for emergency care, making him responsible under the theory of supervisory liability.

The appellate court held that Bolin had not directly observed Brown's condition and had no indication that his standing orders or intimidation of the nurses put prisoners' health at risk prior to Brown's death. Thus, he was entitled to qualified immunity. The county was also entitled to qualified immunity as there was no proof it had established an unconstitutional policy at the jail that was a "moving force" in the violation of Brown's rights.

"Although we reach these conclusions based on the facts available to Dr. Bolin and the County at the time of Brown's incarceration, this holding is not approval of the medical care provided by Dr. Bolin or the Wichita County Jail," the Fifth Circuit wrote. "As pointed out by the plaintiffs, there have been two documented cases of improper assessment by the nursing staff at the jail since Brown's death which could be viewed as evidence that the nurses do not have the proper training to recognize critical medical situations.... However, based on the record in this case, we affirm the judgment of the district court granting qualified immunity to these defendants."

One appellate judge dissented and would have denied qualified immunity to Bolin. The plaintiffs filed a petition for writ of certiorari with the Supreme Court, which was denied on June 17, 2013. See: Brown v. Bolin, 500 Fed.Appx. 309 (5th Cir. 2012), cert. denied.

Apparently, medical care at the jail hasn't improved much. On May 21, 2014, former Wichita County Jail prisoner Nicole Guerrero filed suit in federal court after she delivered a baby in a solitary confinement cell in 2012, without medical assistance, resulting in her baby's death. The lawsuit names the county, sheriff, registered nurse Ladonna Anderson and Correctional Healthcare Management as defendants.

Guerrero said she was denied medical care when she began to experience labor, even though she was "in obvious distress, [and] began to moan, scream and cry." Anderson's nursing license is listed as "delinquent" by the Texas Board of Nursing. The lawsuit remains pending. See: Guerrero v. Wichita County, U.S.D.C. (N.D. Tex.), Case No. 7:14-cv-00058-O. ■

Ninth Circuit Again Rejects California's Resistance to ADA Obligations

by Mark Wilson

ON OCTOBER 4, 2013, THE NINTH Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed a district court order requiring California prison officials to disseminate and implement a previously-negotiated County Jail Plan for disabled prisoners and parolees.

As previously reported in PLN, in Armstrong v. Schwarzenegger, 622 F.3d 1058 (9th Cir. 2010), the Ninth Circuit held that prison officials may not “shirk their obligations” under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and Rehabilitation Act by housing state prisoners in county facilities and then claiming no responsibility for their treatment.

“Defendants have the responsibility of ensuring that their prisoners are afforded their rights under the ADA, regardless of where the State incarcerates them,” the appellate court concluded. [See: PLN, Aug. 2012, p.34; Nov. 2011, p.28].

On October 1, 2011, the California legislature adopted California Penal Code § 3056 as part of a “realignment” plan designed to ameliorate prison overcrowding. [See: PLN, June 2014, p.1]. The defendants in Armstrong then argued before the district court that § 3056 absolved them of their responsibility for state prisoners confined in county jails. The court rejected that argument in two separate orders.

The district court then ordered renewed “negotiations and the eventual dissemination to the counties of a compliance plan providing for, among other things, the tracking and monitoring of Armstrong class members housed in county jails.”

The parties eventually negotiated a revised County Jail Plan, but the defendants “refused to disseminate or implement the Plan” after Governor Jerry Brown signed amendments to § 3056 into law on June 27, 2012. The amendments specified that while housed in county jails, state prisoners “shall be under the sole legal custody and jurisdiction of local county facilities.”

The following month the district court again ordered the defendants to disseminate and implement the County Jail Plan. Instead they appealed the court’s order, renewing their argument that § 3056 “absolves them of any responsibility for Armstrong class members during the time in which they are housed in county jails.”

The Ninth Circuit affirmed. “Since 1994, disabled state prisoners and parolees have been engaged in a seemingly never-ending struggle with California state officials over whether defendants must provide disability accommodations under the Americans with Disabilities Act (‘ADA’) and the Rehabilitation Act,” the Court of Appeals wrote. “Notwithstanding a series of careful district court orders dating back to 1996 and an opinion by this Court affirming the issuance of a permanent injunction, defendants have resisted complying with their federal obligations at every turn. These appeals provide no exception.”

The appellate court held that “the state cannot house persons for whom it is responsible in jails where the state reasonably expects indignities and violations of federal law will continue to occur, turn care over to county custodians, and then disown all responsibility for their welfare.” As such, the Court of Appeals found the § 3056 amendments “do not relieve defendants of all responsibility for the discrimination suffered by Armstrong class members housed in county jails, past and present, or of their obligation to assist in preventing further violations.”

The Court noted that the ADA and Rehabilitation Act violations in county jails were “systemwide and extensive,” and involved “the widespread denial of mobility-assistance devices to persons unable to physically function without them, the denial of hearing devices to deaf class members, and the denial of accessibility devices, such as tapping canes, to blind class members. These denials forced disabled class members into the vulnerable position of being dependent on other inmates to enable them to obtain basic services, such as meals, mail, showers, and toilets.”

The Ninth Circuit concluded that the “Defendants remain responsible for taking certain measures to ameliorate or avoid the admitted and ongoing violations of plaintiffs’ rights under the ADA and Rehabilitation Act.” California officials petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari, which was denied on June 9, 2014. See: Armstrong v. Brown, 732 F.3d 955 (9th Cir. 2013), cert. denied. ■

Jails Stop Posting Mug Shots to End “Extortion” by Profiteering Websites

A GROWING NUMBER OF JAILS ARE NO longer putting booking photos of arrestees online in order to prevent websites such as mugshots.com from obtaining and posting them, then charging people to remove them.

At least seven states have passed bills related to the commercial use of mug shots, including Georgia, Texas, Oregon, Illinois, Colorado, Wyoming and Utah; similar legislation has been introduced in over a dozen other states, including California, Florida, New Jersey and Missouri.

In Georgia, mug shots were removed from law enforcement websites as of July 1, 2014. People can still obtain mug shots through public records requests, but must provide a statement that they will not post the photos online and charge a removal fee.

Using mug shots as a business model has been a growing and apparently profitable trend. [See: PLN, Oct. 2012, p.36]. Around 11.6 million people cycle in and out of jails in the U.S. each year, which creates a lucrative market for dozens of mug shot websites.

When South Carolina defense attorney Seth Rose found his client’s booking photos on a site that charged almost $400 to remove them, he decided to take action. “It’s extortion,” he said.

Rose, who serves as a councilman in Richland County, learned that mug shot sites posted every booking photo originally published on the website of the Alvin S. Glenn Detention Center, which removes the photos once a defendant posts bond or leaves the facility.

When several of his clients struggled to have their booking photos removed from mugshots.com, Rose spoke with the county attorney and jail officials. Richland County has a database of over 9,000 photos, making it the state’s second-largest provider of mug shots for the website.

That creates a huge source of potential revenue. Mugshots.com has an “unpublish” link on its site, which directs users to an affiliated website, unpublisharrest.com. That site lets people submit a form requesting removal of their mug shot – but only after they pay a fee that starts at $399. The fee applies even if a person is found not guilty, the charges are dismissed or their record is expunged.

After Rose spoke with Richland County officials, the jail decided to discontinue posting mug shots online. It still lists names and charges for arrestees, and provides mug shots to the media upon request.

Rose said the booking photos can permanently damage a person’s reputation, especially college students he has represented. “It can have lifelong ramifications,” he noted, such as hindering the ability to obtain employment.

Mug shot websites use search engine optimization (SEO) to ensure that people’s booking photos appear at the top of the results for popular search engines like Google and Bing when someone searches for their name.

“They are essentially saying, ‘We’ve got your mug shot online. We know it’s going to interfere with your life and we’re going to charge you to take it down, and if you don’t pay us we’re going to continue to embarrass your personal and business reputation,’” said Ohio attorney Scott Ciolek.

In Florida, the Pinellas County Sheriff’s Office stopped publishing mug shots on its website in January 2014. Sheriff Bob Gualtieri said sites that post booking photos aren’t doing anything illegal, but charging a fee to remove someone’s mug shot is “unconscionable, verging on blackmail and clearly taking advantage of someone’s circumstances.”

Attorneys for mug shot websites have defended their clients’ practices.

“Unpopular speech, unpopular actions are generally protected under the First Amendment, provided they’re not illegal in other ways,” said Marc Epstein, who represents mugshots.com. “It’s uncomfortable, perhaps. But it doesn’t rise anywhere near the level of extortion. We threaten nobody.”

Brian S. Kabateck, a Los Angeles attorney suing one of the websites, disagreed. “They’re putting it out there not for some great public purpose,” he noted. “They’re putting it out there for economic gain. And that’s the only reason they’re doing this.”

In Ohio, a federal lawsuit against two mug shot websites, bustedmugshots.com and mugshotsonline.com, settled in December 2013. The sites agreed to pay $7,500 and not charge people for removing their photos. Both sites are run by Citizens Information Associates LLC, based in Austin, Texas. See: Lashaway v. D’Antonio, U.S.D.C. (N.D. Ohio), Case No. 3:13-cv-01733-JZ.

Another suit filed in Florida is challenging the practice of posting public mug shots on private websites and then charging fees to remove them. The suit names the operators of nine mug shots sites, including mugshots.com and whosarrested.com. The plaintiffs moved to certify the case as a class-action, which was denied by the federal district court in May 2014. A renewed motion for class certification remains pending. See: Bilotta v. Citizens Information Associates LLC, U.S.D.C. (M.D. Fla.), Case No. 8:13-cv-02811-CEH-TGW.

Meanwhile, mugshots.com, which describes itself as a “Google for Mugshots,” continues to partner with unpublisharrest.com to remove booking photos from its site – for fees ranging from $399 for one arrest to $1,799 for five arrests. ■

Oregon Attorney Fee Repayment Requires Showing of Ability to Pay

by Mark Wilson

ON OCTOBER 9, 2013, THE OREGON Court of Appeals held that a trial court lacked the authority to require a criminal defendant to pay $37,400 in court-appointed attorney fees.

Oregon criminal defendants may be ordered to pay their court-appointed attorney's expenses. However, a court "lacks authority" to impose such fees unless it determines that the defendant "is or may be able to pay them." That determination must be supported by the record and is not satisfied "by a speculative possibility that a defendant may receive a gift, inheritance, or other windfall."

Larry Lynn Wallace pleaded no contest to murder with a firearm in exchange for a sentence of life imprisonment with a 25-year minimum. Additionally, the prosecutor asked the court to sentence Wallace to pay $37,400 in court-appointed attorney fees plus $26,018.09 in restitution, a $607 unitary assessment and a $35 offense surcharge. The prosecutor made no showing that Wallace had the ability to pay any of the requested financial assessments, other than speculative conjectures. Noting that Wallace had been receiving Social Security disability payments prior to his incarceration, his attorney argued that he did not, and would not, have the ability to pay.

"If defendant were released after 25 years, he would be 76 years old. His employment opportunities would be limited by his physical disability and his age. According to defense counsel, they would also be limited by defendant's lack of education and mental-health problems. Therefore, defense counsel argued, '[defendant] does not have the ability right now, and he will not have the ability in the conceivable future, realistically, for the rest of his life[,] to pay anything more than restitution.'"

Nevertheless, the trial court ordered Wallace to pay the financial assessments. With respect to the court-appointed attorney fees, the court found "that at least at this point you don't have an ability to pay that. Although it is uncertain whether you would have the ability to pay that in the future. And I say that because I don't know what money you may come into as a result of your family relationships that could be put toward making payments." As such, the court ordered Wallace to pay the attorney fees but suspended the payment.

The Oregon Court of Appeals reversed, holding that "the trial court did not find (and, given the record before it, could not have found) that defendant was or might be able to pay the $37,400 in attorney fees – in addition to the $26,018.09 in restitution, the $607 unitary assessment, and the $35 offense surcharge – given the length of his incarceration, his disability, and the other limitations on his ability to earn any income in prison or upon release."

The appellate court found that the suspension of payment of the fees by the trial court was irrelevant, because "under ORS 161.655(4), the trial court did not have the authority to impose the fees in the first instance." See: Oregon v. Wallace, 258 Ore. App 800, 311 P.3d 975 (Or. Ct. App. 2013).

Private Prison Contractor Not Subject to New Jersey's Open Records Act

ON OCTOBER 12, 2012, A NEW JERSEY state superior court held that Community Education Centers (CEC), a private prison contractor, was not required to disclose its records under the state's Open Public Records Act (OPRA), N.J.S.A. § 47:1A-1 to -13. The decision was affirmed on appeal.

CEC operates Delaney Hall, a prison-like facility, for Essex County. The company contracts with Education and Health Centers of America (EHCA), a private non-profit entity, and EHCA contracts separately with the county to manage the facility.

John Paff filed an application in state court to require CEC to comply with his OPRA request for disclosure of records, including attorney billing records and personnel files for three CEC employees. The company opposed his request, arguing it was not subject to OPRA because it was not a "public entity."

The court held that records subject to OPRA are limited to those kept or filed by any officer, commission, agency or authority of the state or political subdivision thereof in the course of the government's official business. "OPRA defines 'public agency' to include 'any of the principal departments in the Executive Branch of the State Government ... and any independent State authority, commission, instrumentality or agency.'" Thus, under the plain language of the statute, CEC's records were not subject to OPRA.

Paff contended, however, that OPRA "applies to taxpayer-funded, governmental activities regardless of whether they are carried out by a public or private entity." He argued New Jersey should apply a governmental function test for its application of OPRA – a test that has been adopted for public records laws in other states. [See, e.g.: PLN, June 2013, p.14; Oct. 2008, p.24].

The superior court held that although the New Jersey Supreme Court had implicitly used governmental function language in Sussex Commons Associates, LLC v. Rutgers, 210 N.J. 531 (N.J. 2012), absent a direct finding that the state had adopted a governmental function test, it must continue to abide by the creation test under which only entities created by a political subdivision of the government are subject to OPRA.

Consequently, Paff's application was denied. See: Paff v. Community Education Centers, Essex County Superior Court (NJ), Docket No. ESX-L-1658-12.

Paff appealed and the Appellate Division affirmed in an unpublished ruling in November 2013. The court found that "CEC was not created, nor is it controlled, by any governmental entity," and thus was "not a 'public agency' under OPRA." See: Paff v. Community Education Centers, 2013 N.J. Super. Unpub. LEXIS 2813 (App.Div. Nov. 21, 2013), cert. denied.

Washington Supreme Court Recognizes Racial Bias in Jury Selection but Fails to Take Action

by Mark Wilson

"PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES ARE USED in trial courts throughout this state, often based largely or entirely on racial stereotypes or generalizations," declared Washington State Supreme Court Justice Steven Gonzalez. "As a result, many qualified persons in this state are being excluded from jury service because of race."

Peremptory challenges date back to 13th century England, Gonzalez noted. Since the king was allowed to remove potential jurors for cause, peremptory challenges were created to make trials more fair.

Washington's territorial legislature adopted peremptory challenges, without debate, more than 150 years ago. The practice is permitted in all states.

Today, prospective Washington jurors may be removed for cause based on evidence of potential impartiality. The defense and prosecution are also allowed three peremptory challenges each to remove jurors for no reason at all, so long as it's not for purposeful discrimination.

In Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79 (1986), the U.S. Supreme Court attempted – but failed – to eliminate institutional discrimination during the jury selection process.

"Twenty-six years after Batson, a growing body of evidence shows that racial discrimination remains rampant in jury selection," wrote Washington State Supreme Court Justice Charlie K. Wiggins. "In part, this is because Batson recognizes only 'purposeful discrimination,' whereas racism is often unintentional, institutional or unconscious."

Kirk Saintcalle, an African American defendant, challenged his first-degree felony murder conviction for a 2007 homicide, alleging racial bias in jury selection at his trial. The only black person in the jury pool was singled out by prosecutors for additional questioning about her views on race in the justice system. During that questioning, she revealed that a friend had been murdered two weeks earlier.

Prosecutors used a peremptory challenge to dismiss the juror, claiming they did so because she said she did not know how her friend's murder would affect her during the trial.

Given that prosecutors would not have learned of the murder if not for the questions regarding her views on race, Saintcalle claimed the prosecution's rationale was pretextual. The prosecutors had also tried, unsuccessfully, to dismiss the only Mexican-American on the jury panel.

While unanimously recognizing that racial bias in jury selection is a problem, the Washington Supreme Court was sharply divided about what to do about it, as evidenced by an August 1, 2013 ruling with five opinions totaling 110 pages in Saintcalle's appeal.

Eight of the nine Justices voted to uphold Saintcalle's conviction because they could not conclude that the juror's exclusion was clearly improper. Yet they unanimously agreed that race is often a factor – consciously or unconsciously – when attorneys use peremptory challenges.

Justice Wiggins cited studies that found prosecutors typically use peremptory challenges to remove black jurors while defense lawyers most frequently exclude white jurors.

Suggesting that peremptory challenges increase administrative and appellate costs but do not do any good, Justice Gonzalez followed the lead of U.S. Supreme Court Justices Thurgood Marshall and Stephen Breyer in proposing the elimination of the practice. However, none of his colleagues wanted to make such drastic, sweeping changes.

The authors of the lead opinion in Saintcalle's appeal also acknowledged the problem, but believed the Court could craft new rules to prevent racial bias in jury selection. Allowing a judge to overrule a peremptory challenge if there is a reasonable probability that it was motivated by race might address the issue, Justice Wiggins suggested. He conceded, however, that prohibiting peremptory challenges may be the only way to eliminate racial bias.

While also concerned about racial bias, Justices Barbara Madsen and Jim Johnson felt the issue was not properly before the Court. Justice Debra Stephens wrote separately, suggesting that the legislature, not the Court, must fix the problem since peremptory challenges are enshrined in state law.

Thus, while acknowledging that "Racial inequalities permeate our criminal justice system and present important moral issues we all must grapple with," the Washington Supreme Court ultimately did nothing to address or correct that problem, and upheld Saintcalle's conviction. See: Washington v. Saintcalle, 178 Wn.2d 34, 309 P.3d 326 (Wash. 2013), cert. denied. ■

Seventh Circuit: Indiana Malicious Prosecution Claim Cognizable via § 1983

by Mark Wilson

ON OCTOBER 21, 2013, THE SEVENTH Circuit Court of Appeals reversed a district court's dismissal of a former prisoner's malicious prosecution claim.

While investigating a March 2001 burglary-arson at a high school in Frankton, Indiana, police officers, "without any lawful reason, decided that Billy Julian should be a suspect." They coerced another suspect and other witnesses into fingering Julian. Police investigators "knew the accusations were false – the officers had fabricated them and fed them to the witnesses."

Julian was criminally charged in April 2001, and convicted and sentenced to 15 years in prison in March 2003. He later prevailed in a post-conviction appeal by proving that a key prosecution witness had lied about being at the crime scene with him. The witness was on house arrest and wearing a GPS monitor at the time, and the monitor indicated that he had not left his home on the night the crime occurred.

Julian was released from prison in 2006. After the state unsuccessfully appealed, prosecutors decided to retry him in December 2007.

Police threatened Julian in an effort to deter him from pursuing a malicious prosecution lawsuit, and his attorney advised him not to file suit until after the retrial. The charges were finally dismissed in July 2010, and Julian filed a complaint in federal court in November 2011.

The district court dismissed the suit, holding that it was time-barred and could not be brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 because Indiana law provided an adequate remedy for malicious prosecution claims.

The Seventh Circuit reversed. Citing Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477 (1994), the appellate court first concluded that Julian's cause of action accrued when the charges were dismissed in 2010, not when his conviction was reversed in 2006. Therefore, his 2011 complaint was filed within the applicable two-year statute of limitations.

The Court of Appeals also held that Julian's malicious prosecution claim could be brought under § 1983 because Indiana law does not provide an adequate remedy for malicious prosecutions by state officers.

"After being released from prison in May 2006, Julian remained in limbo for more than four years," the appellate court wrote. "Limbo is not as bad as hell, but it's sufficiently bad that it can't be written off completely. Yet that is what the defendants ask us to do: recognize no remedy for malicious prosecution by Indiana public officers, leaving the defendant remediless if he manages to avoid jail or prison for any of the time during which he's being maliciously prosecuted."

The Seventh Circuit further directed the district court to decide on remand if equitable estoppel prohibits the defendants from asserting a statute of limitations defense against Julian's separate claim that prosecutors withheld exculpatory evidence in his case. See: Julian v. Hanna, 732 F.3d 842 (7th Cir. 2013).

The case remains pending on remand, with a trial date scheduled in May 2015.

Report: Prisons in Honduras are Dangerous, Violent and Corrupt

by Matt Clarke

WHEN A FEBRUARY 2012 FIRE AT A prison in Comayagua, Honduras killed 361 prisoners after guards abandoned their posts – leaving the prisoners to die in their cells – there was hope that the resulting international attention focused on the prison crisis in the Central American nation might lead to reforms. [See: PLN, July 2013, p.52]. However, such reforms have failed to materialize.

Take, for example, the prison at San Pedro Sula (SPS), which the Associated Press was allowed to tour in May 2012. The prison, built for 800, houses over 2,000 prisoners. And the guards were not in control of the overcrowded facility – the prisoners were.

When the AP made arrangements to visit SPS, they didn't seek authorization from prison officials; rather, they needed permission from the prisoner in charge, Noe Betancourt. Betancourt even provided a security team of eight prisoners to escort the journalists during their tour of the facility.

The prison is essentially an autonomous town complete with women, children, businesses and a marketplace. What the AP reporters didn't see was any guards. During the day, guards do not go past a painted yellow line in the outer section of the prison, and prisoners do not cross it from the inner areas of the compound. That line is called "the line of death," according to a report released in August 2013 by the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (ICHR). [See: PLN, Jan. 2014, p.56].

"Internal control of the prisons has been ceded into the hands of the prisoners themselves," the report stated, noting that prisoners control all 24 correctional facilities in Honduras.

The ICHR report said there are two padlocks on the prison gate: the guards lock the padlock on the outside and the prisoners lock the one on the inside. Honduran authorities admitted they "have no power to change anything."

The system of prisoners running the prisons is not unusual in Honduras; rather, it is the standard model according to the report. And inside the prisons either side can literally get away with murder.

No guards were prosecuted for abandoning prisoners to a fiery death at Comayagua in 2012. Likewise, when the prisoners at SPS were fed up with their leader, Mario Enriquez, and killed him along with 13 of his followers two weeks after the fire, no charges were filed.

The prisoners had put up with Enriquez's brutal abuse, but when he sharply increased the fees they must pay for everything from food and cell space to permission to run a business, and his followers raped a visitor at the facility, outraged prisoners cut off Enriquez's head, removed his heart and fed it to his dog. Then they killed the dog.

The ICHR report said prison overcrowding was primarily responsible for the huge death toll in the fire at SPS. Overcrowding is rampant in Honduran prisons, with antiquated buildings housing, in at least two facilities, twice as many prisoners as they were originally designed to accommodate. The report also listed other significant concerns, including a "lack of appropriate, safe physical installations, deplorable health and hygiene conditions, failure to provide adequate food and drinking water and the lack of adequate medical care."

The report further detailed a black market economy in many Honduran prisons, where prisoners buy and sell food, clothing and household items in marketplaces that are not regulated and subject to corruption.

At San Pedro Sula, for example, the prison yard is the site of a huge bazaar that includes "barbers' shops, cafeterias, bakeries, sales of fruit and food of all kinds, sales of medications and cloth, tailoring workshops, a cobbler's shop, a leather workshop, carpentry, a cabinetmaker's workshop, crafts, manufacture of mirrors, billiard tables, games tables and many soft drink dispensing machines."

The Honduran government admitted there is little it can do, calling prisoners' control of the facilities a "necessary evil."

"This system, as was observed, is accepted by the prison authorities as the only viable way of maintaining order and stability between them and the prison populations, and the 'coordinators' [prisoners with special privileges] are considered collaborators and even allies of the authorities."

The ICHR report said the "coordinators" have a wide range of responsibilities, including applying punishment as discipline, setting the prices that prisoners must pay to live in cells, establishing pricing for food and resolving any conflicts.

"Above all," the report noted, "the 'coordinators' serve as spokesmen or liaisons with the prison authorities, and are really privileged prisoners who exercise a degree of decision-making power within the prisons, often sharing the benefits with the prison authorities."

Government officials acknowledge that allowing prisoners to take charge of the prisons is a major factor in terms of corruption. Funds collected by the leader of the prisoners at SPS, for example, are shared with the prison administration, which claims to use the money to pay for prisoner upkeep. Costs range from $50 for the worst cells to $750 for a clean, safer cell. One prisoner pays $25 a week for permission to run a restaurant.

According to prison officials, the money is necessary to operate the underfunded prison. SPS administrator Hugo Hernandez said he receives about $250 per prisoner per year from the government's budget and, without the $6,000 a month that is his share of the fees, he would not have funds to pay for maintenance, gas to transport prisoners to court, supplies for the prison hospital or sufficient food.

"For some it's corruption, but for us it's the only way to keep the system from breaking apart," noted assistant prison director Carlos Polanco.

On August 3, 2013, one day after the ICHR report was released, clashes involving gang members at a National Penitentiary prison in Tamara left three prisoners dead and at least 15 people injured, including three guards. The facility houses over 3,300 prisoners.

Following the violent disturbance, Honduran President Porfirio Lobo announced he was sending in military troops to regain control over the facility. In a statement, Lobo said the goal of putting soldiers in charge of the prison was to "end the reign of criminals in our prison system, which has done so much damage to our society." # Ninth Circuit Vacates FRCP 4(m) Dismissal Without Notice

THE NINTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS held on October 30, 2013 that a district court's failure to provide notice before dismissing a complaint for non-service and denying leave to amend were abuses of discretion.

Nevada state prisoner John Crowley suffers from bipolar disorder, delusions, Parkinson's disease and hypertension. While confined at the Lovelock Correctional Center (LCC), he was prescribed Lithium three times a day.

After Crowley was transferred to the High Desert State Prison on April 16, 2009, however, his prescription for Lithium was changed to larger doses twice a day. Prison officials claimed that Dr. Daniel Sussman altered the prescription, though he had not examined Crowley.

On May 10 and 14, 2009, Crowley's cellmate alerted medical staff that Crowley was unresponsive and acting "bizarre." They did nothing until admitting him to the infirmary on May 16, when a guard reported similar unusual behavior.

A physician examined Crowley two days later and sent him to a hospital emergency room. He remained hospitalized for three weeks, undergoing treatment for Lithium toxicity and dehydration.

Crowley filed suit in federal court alleging that prison medical staff were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical condition. After the complaint was dismissed on initial screening, he filed his first amended complaint. Before the court or defendants took any action, Crowley filed a second amended complaint and requested leave to amend again once he learned the names of the correct defendants.

The district court issued an April 25, 2011 order directing the Nevada Attorney General (AG) to advise the court within 21 days whether she would accept service for the named defendants. The order also directed Crowley to "file a motion requesting the issuance of a summons and specifying a full name and address" for any defendant for whom the AG refused service, within 120 days of the refusal.

Crowley's copy of the order was returned to the court as undeliverable on May 2, 2011, because he had been transferred back to LCC. The order was not resent because the district court did not have Crowley's current address.

On May 9, 2011, Crowley notified the court of his address change, but the April 25 order was never sent to him at LCC.

Dr. Sussman was the only defendant for whom the AG refused service. Crowley did not serve Dr. Sussman within 120 days, and the district court sua sponte dismissed the action against Sussman without providing notice to Crowley under FRCP 4(m).

The court then granted summary judgment to all the remaining defendants and dismissed the case without ruling on Crowley's motion to amend his complaint.

Crowley appealed and the Ninth Circuit reversed the dismissal of the claims against Dr. Sussman.

"Because the record does not reflect that the district court provided the required Rule 4(m) notice prior to the entry of judgment in favor of Dr. Sussman," the Court of Appeals found that Crowley "was 'precluded from attempting to show good cause' or excusable neglect for his failure to serve Dr. Sussman in a timely manner." As such, the district court had abused its discretion.

The appellate court also concluded that denying Crowley leave to amend "to name the correct defendants and to discover whether any delays on their part in providing medical treatment caused or exacerbated his Lithium toxicity" was an abuse of discretion. The district court's grant of summary judgment to the other defendants was affirmed. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit vacated in part, affirmed in part and remanded the case for further proceedings.

Following remand, the district court granted Crowley's motion to appoint counsel on May 8, 2014. The case remains pending. See: Crowley v. Bannister, 734 F.3d 967 (9th Cir. 2013). ■

Kansas DNA Testing Eligibility Extended to Second-Degree Murder

by Mark Wilson

THE KANSAS SUPREME COURT HELD on October 4, 2013 that a state law denying DNA testing to prisoners convicted of second-degree murder violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Kansas prisoners convicted of first-degree murder or rape may petition for post-conviction DNA testing under K.S.A. 21-2512. Second-degree murderers, however, are ineligible for similar DNA testing.

In 1993, Jerome Cheeks was convicted of second-degree murder and sentenced to 15 years to life imprisonment. Over a decade later he filed a pro se petition, pursuant to § 21-2512, for DNA testing of 30 items collected from the crime scene. His petition was summarily denied, with the court finding that Cheeks was ineligible for DNA testing under the statute's plain language.

The Kansas Supreme Court reversed, concluding that first- and second-degree murderers are "similarly situated" because they receive the same maximum sentence of life imprisonment.

The Court then applied the "rational basis test," noting that it had previously held in State v. Denney, 278 Kan. 643, 101 P.3d 1257 (Kan. 2004), that neither cost nor severity of the crime justifies excluding similarly situated offenders from DNA testing eligibility.

Following Denney and conceiving of no rational basis for barring second-degree murderers from DNA testing, the Court concluded that "K.S.A. 21-2512 violates the Equal Protection Clause and is unconstitutional."

Rather than invalidate § 21-2512, however, the Supreme Court extended "the benefits of the statute to include those improperly omitted." As such, the Court reversed and directed the lower court to determine on remand "whether Cheeks satisfied the remaining statutory requirements entitling him to DNA testing under K.S.A. 21-2512." Three justices issued dissenting opinions. See: Kansas v. Cheeks, 298 Kan. 1, 310 P.3d 346 (Kan. 2013). ■

News in Brief

Alabama: As previously reported in PLN, former Clay County jail administrator Jeffrey “Scott” Cotney filed a lawsuit alleging defamation, slander, libel and other claims related to accusations that he had used his position at the jail to sexually abuse prisoners. [See: PLN, March 2014, p.36]. On November 27, 2013, a federal grand jury indicted Cotney on eight counts of deprivation of rights under color of law in connection with those same accusations. He pleaded guilty to the charges and was sentenced in May 2014 to four years in federal prison.

Albania: On November 23, 2013, seven prisoners serving life sentences for murder escaped from the Drenova Prison. Police described the escapees as armed and dangerous, and advised residents to remain behind closed doors. The neighboring countries of Greece and Macedonia also were warned of the escape, which involved the prisoners disarming a guard and fleeing by car during severe weather, resulting in a massive manhunt.

Arizona: On November 22, 2013, the Arizona Department of Corrections issued a press release describing the arrests of a former guard and an ASPC Winslow prisoner who had allegedly extorted another prisoner and his family. The scheme involved former guard Jordan Martie, who demanded protection money from a prisoner after he was threatened by Martie’s unnamed prisoner-accomplice. “This now-former officer betrayed his oath, compromised his position and placed many others at risk by allegedly engaging in criminal activity,” said ADC Director Charles L. Ryan. “I will urge that he and the suspect inmate be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law.”

Arizona: Pink underwear, horrendous food and around-the-clock holiday music are just some of the indignities faced by prisoners held in Sheriff Joe Arpaio’s Maricopa County jails. In 2005, Arpaio ordered that holiday cheer be mandatory in all jail facilities by forcing prisoners and staff alike to listen to continuous Christmas melodies from Alvin and the Chipmunks, Elvis Presley and others. In December 2013, however, in response to complaints that the music was more irritating than joyful, Arpaio scaled back the holiday songs to two hours in the morning and two hours in the evening.

Australia: As Victoria’s prison population stretches its available bed space to the breaking point, authorities have come up with a solution. Fifty shipping containers were installed in December 2013 to house minimum-security prisoners at the Dhurringile prison in northern Victoria; Corrections Commissioner Jan Shuard said they were part of a larger plan to deal with unprecedented growth in the state’s prison population. The containers each house two men and are fully equipped with a toilet, shower, beds and cupboards. As of January 2014 over 50 low-risk prisoners had been moved into the shipping container-cells.

California: Every year since 1998, the Vietnam Veterans chapter at San Quentin has accepted donated toys for distribution to children visiting their incarcerated fathers around the holidays. In December 2013, San Quentin prison staff quashed the joy of gift-giving by not only limiting children to two toys each, but also taking toys back from some of the youngsters. Family members expressed frustration at the Grinch-like prison employees; San Quentin spokesman Sam Robinson confirmed that some toys had been confiscated from children, but explained that staff wanted to ensure fairness in the application of the two-toy policy to ensure that all children received toys.

California: At 11:39 a.m. on December 17, 2013, an oven explosion in the kitchen at the Santa Rita Jail critically injured one prisoner and wounded nine others. According to Alameda County Fire Department spokeswoman Aisha Knowles, six prisoners were treated at the jail’s infirmary while four were taken to local hospitals. One deputy was also treated for ringing in his ears. The Santa Rita Jail is the third-largest jail in California and serves as Alameda County’s main jail facility.

California: The Fresno Bee reported on December 14, 2013 that psychiatrist Pratap Narayan had been accused by the State Medical Board of negligence and incompetence while employed as a doctor at the Fresno County jail and, later, at Avenal State Prison. Dr. Narayan allegedly misdiagnosed mentally ill prisoners, prescribed medications without examining patients and recommended inadequate doses of psychiatric drugs. Narayan’s employment status at Avenal was under review after the Medical Board’s inquiry, according to Dana Simas, a spokeswoman for the state prison system. An amended disciplinary complaint was filed against Dr. Narayan in July 2014.

Canada: On December 4, 2013, a Canadian court declined to address the case of two minimum-security prisoners who had petitioned to share housing as a same-sex couple at the Riverbend Annex in Prince Albert. The court instead decided that the prison’s grievance system was the proper channel for determining whether the couple should be allowed to share housing. Jean Richter and Leslie Sinobert are both serving life sentences at the Saskatchewan Penitentiary, but were transferred to the Annex. The facility has individual units that can house between eight and 10 prisoners. In May 2014, prison officials denied Richter and Sinobert’s request on the grounds that Sinobert needs special mental health housing.

Colorado: Thomas Wierdsma, a senior vice president with The GEO Group, a private prison firm that runs several immigration detention centers, will not face charges for threatening to use his position to deport his Hungarian-born daughter-in-law. Last year a jury in a civil case awarded $1.2 million against Thomas and Charles Wierdsma, his son, for “outrageous conduct.” After Charles was arrested for beating his wife, Beatrix Szeremi, the elder Wierdsma attempted to evict Szeremi, who was in the United States legally, from the home she shared with Charles. He also tried to intimidate her into removing photos of her bruised face from her Facebook page. PLN originally broke this story in 2012. [See: PLN, March 2012, p.16]. On December 31, 2013, a spokesperson for the Boulder District Attorney’s office said no criminal charges would be filed against Thomas Wierdsma. The jury award in the civil case was later reduced to $12,000 due to a state law cap on punitive damages.

Florida: The Orlando Sentinel reported on November 24, 2013 that an investigation into the mistaken release of an Orange County jail prisoner resulted in disciplinary action against four jail employees. Officials found that Alice Rodriguez, Kimberly Howard, Lydell Andreas and supervisor Shunta Heath had violated policy by failing to double-check John Lanard Baker’s release paperwork. Baker was allowed to post bond and leave the jail when he was supposed to be returned to state custody. He remained free for nearly five months.

Florida: Assistant U.S. Attorney Malisa Chokshi said a former guard at the John E. Goode Pre-Trial Detention Facility received $110,000 in false tax refunds after filing over 50 fraudulent returns. Harold Bush Walbey III was arrested on December 12, 2013 and pleaded guilty to stealing prisoners' names and Social Security numbers, ordering debit cards in their names, and filing income tax returns in 2010 and 2011 using the false identities. Walbey had worked for the Jacksonville Sheriff's Office from 1992 to February 2013; he is scheduled to go to trial in November 2014.

Florida: Alexander Lansky, a property clerk at the Pinellas County Jail, admitted to having an addiction to prescription pills when detectives interviewed him following complaints from two prisoners who said their legally-prescribed painkillers were missing from their property when they were released. The sheriff's office accused Lansky of stealing Vicodin, Percocet and morphine pills from five prisoners, and he was charged with five counts of grand theft and five counts of possession of prescription pills on October 22, 2013.

Illinois: Approximately one hour after speaking with his girlfriend in the visitors' area at Stateville Correctional Center on December 12, 2013, 33-year-old prisoner Angel Garcia jumped to his death from a fifth floor housing tier. He was taken to Provena Saint Joseph Medical Center with serious head trauma and other injuries, and pronounced dead later that day. Garcia, who was not on suicide watch or classified as a mental health patient, was serving a 70-year sentence for murder.

Indiana: An Indianapolis security guard who called himself the "Night Lion" was found guilty on December 2, 2013 of 14 charges related to impersonating a police officer to coerce sex from prostitutes. At the time of the incidents, Nicholas Houston was employed as a guard by The GEO Group at a state facility in Plainfield. Prosecutors said Houston threatened the women with arrest if they refused to have sex with him. Deputy Prosecutor Rachel Jefferson told the jury that Houston, in his own words, said he "stalked his prey" and targeted young and vulnerable women.

Kentucky: In less than a week in December 2013, two former employees at the Blackburn Correctional Complex were arrested and charged with official misconduct and rape for engaging in illegal sexual relationships with prisoners. Jennifer Wiseman was charged on December 11, 2013 and Bernadette Luttrell was arrested on December 17, 2013. According to state prison officials, Wiseman worked as a guard and Luttrell was employed in the facility's mattress plant.

Michigan: On December 5, 2013, Mary Lucas was identified as the Mason County jailer who was involved in an October 2013 assault on another Mason County jail guard. The Michigan Sheriff's Association Missions Team turned over the results of its investigation into Lucas' alleged misconduct to the Mason County Prosecutor's Office. A warrant was subsequently issued and Lucas, 46, was charged with assault and battery. She was released on a personal recognizance bond and placed on administrative leave pending the outcome of the case.

Michigan: Former Genesee County Sheriff's Deputy Amy Rebecca Gatica, 35, was arrested and charged with more than two dozen crimes related to smuggling drugs into the county jail and using a private physician's credentials to obtain prescription painkillers. On December 3, 2013, Gatica was ordered to return to court to face a preliminary examination after being denied admission to the county's drug court program. At the time of her arrest, cocaine and other drugs were found during a search of her home and vehicle. On June 23, 2014, Gatica was sentenced to 18 months' probation in exchange for pleading guilty to charges of cocaine possession and obtaining a controlled substance by fraud.

Minnesota: Angel Lynn Benjamin briefly escaped from MCF Shakopee on December 2, 2013 by running past the facility's fenceless perimeter. Although she was captured 23 minutes later, the escape renewed calls for a fence to be installed at the prison. Shakopee Mayor Brad Tabke said requests for a fence have been unsuccessful during several sessions of the Minnesota legislature. Since 1995, seven prisoners have escaped from MCF Shakopee and 18 planned escapes were thwarted. In May 2014 the legislature finally passed a bill that includes nearly $5.4 million for a fence, although there is no timeline for its installation.

Nebraska: On December 2, 2013, thirty-three prisoners at the Nebraska State Penitentiary refused to return to their cells for several hours in protest of a policy that limits the number of prisoners who can be on the recreation yard at the same time. Trash can fires set during the protest were quickly extinguished, and some prisoners had to be moved to other locations due to the smoke. No one was injured and there was no major damage, but the prison was placed on lockdown while staff investigated the incident and prepared disciplinary write-ups.

New Jersey: A plea agreement has been reached in the case of John Follo, 50, a retired guard who monitored youthful offenders on home detention in Essex County. On December 2, 2013, Follo admitted in court that he was coaching a high school softball team during hours he had claimed to be on the job. He pleaded guilty to one count of tampering with public records, and prosecutors recommended that he serve three years in prison. Follo was a long-time county employee who served as president of the prison guard supervisors' union.

New Zealand: On December 11, 2013, prison officials reported that a major riot had been caused by prisoners drunk on home-brewed hooch, and as a result removed alcohol-based hand sanitizer from all prisons and limited the amount of fresh fruit that prisoners can have. Chief Executive Ray Smith said the measures would not solve the issue of alcohol production, but would reduce the risk of prisoners being able to accumulate fruit. During the 10-hour riot, prisoners used sports equipment as weapons, set cell blocks on fire and broke into staff areas. Twenty-three prisoners face charges related to the disturbance.

North Carolina: Anita Kaye Vestal, 36, did it for love. The former Swain County jailer is accused of helping prisoner Jeffery Miles escape in March 2009 so the two could "be together." [See: PLN, May 2009, p.50]. On December 2, 2013, prosecutors closed the state's case against Vestal on charges of harboring an escapee, obstruction of justice and accessory after the fact to murder, and two days later the jury returned a guilty verdict. Vestal was sentenced to 34-41 months in prison. Miles and Vestal were the subject of a segment on "America's Most Wanted" after the escape, in which Vestal provided Miles with the keys to a jail door and the outer fence that surrounded the facility. They were captured in Vallejo, California in April 2009.

Oregon: John Edward Sipple, 69, a retired Oregon Department of Corrections employee, was arrested on October 31, 2013 on six counts of first-degree theft related to approximately $35,000 in missing funds from the Inmate Welfare account at the Oregon State Correctional Institution in Salem. Sipple had worked for the prison system for 29 years and was lauded in a performance evaluation for ensuring the funds were "used appropriately." An audit earlier in 2013 revealed that approximately $26,000 was missing from deposits made by visitors for use of storage lockers. That investigation was closed when detectives could not uncover enough evidence to make an arrest in the theft. In May 2014, Sipple pleaded guilty to five counts of first-degree theft; he was placed on three years' probation and agreed to pay $31,729.38 in restitution. He had retired in 2012 and the guilty plea will not affect his state pension.

Pakistan: On November 29, 2013, over a dozen female prisoners at a jail in Lahore were rushed to a hospital when they became sick after eating food contaminated by a lizard that fell into the cooking pot the day before. Chicken curry prepared in the pot was being served to the prisoners when the incident occurred; according to news reports, authorities stopped serving the food when the women began to get sick. Deputy Inspector General of Police and Prisons Malik Mubashar said an investigation had been launched into the food poisoning incident.

Sweden: In early November 2013, a Swedish prisoner escaped to go to the dentist because he "just couldn't stand" the pain from a toothache he had complained about to prison officials for four days. The unidentified 51-year-old prisoner had been sentenced to one month behind bars and was scheduled to be released the day after he escaped. He surrendered to police once his tooth had been treated. According to news reports, the escape resulted in his sentence being extended by one day.

Syria: The Syrian Network for Human Rights reported in December 2013 that six prisoners froze to death at the Aleppo Central Prison. The facility houses over 4,000 prisoners and is often plagued by attacks from opposition groups in addition to very cold weather. Previously, 10 other prisoners at the facility had died due to freezing temperatures. Some 50,000 people in the war-torn nation struggle with the cold, and at least 16 children have died due to the frigid weather.

Texas: According to a November 20, 2013 report by ABC TV affiliate KTRE, former Angelina County jailer Stevon

Eugene Crowder, 53, was indicted on three felony charges and eight class A misdemeanors for sexually harassing and abusing female trustees who worked for him in the jail's kitchen. The prisoners and one of their family members filed a complaint that led to an investigation by the Angelina County Sheriff's Office; interviews were conducted with prisoners in Angelina County and at Texas Department of Criminal Justice facilities in Henderson, Coryell and Burnett counties. One of the prisoners said Crowder had treated them like "pieces of meat."

Texas: On November 11, 2013, Michael Logan Brown was fooling around with some friends and got his hand stuck in a set of handcuffs. Finding himself without a key, Brown decided to visit the local police station. That might have been a good idea had he not had a small amount of marijuana in his front pocket or an outstanding warrant for criminal mischief. He did, however, and Brown traded the handcuffs for a jail cell and now faces two misdemeanor charges.

Texas: A former guard at the privately-operated Jack Harwell Detention Center was among at least five employees arrested in October 2013 during an ongoing investigation into improprieties between staff and prisoners at the facility. Melissa Suzanne Corona was indicted on March 20, 2014 on a charge of improper sexual activity with a person in custody. According to an affidavit, Corona had sexual contact with a prisoner at the facility on at least two occasions.

Virginia: A former probation officer with the Virginia Department of Corrections was indicted by a grand jury on September 3, 2013 on drug, sex and bribery charges. Meaghan Fields, 29, was employed at the VDOC's Staunton office from October 2010 through September 2012. On January 27, 2014, she entered Alford pleas to two counts of felony carnal knowledge for having sexual encounters with a probationer. "I will not tolerate actions by those in positions of power which would erode the public's confidence in our criminal justice system and our government as a whole," said Attorney General Mark Herring.

West Virginia: Former Clay County Sheriff Miles Slack has his ex-wife to thank for being placed on probation after she made an emotional appeal for leniency as Slack was being sentenced on federal wiretapping charges. In an attempt to monitor his then-wife's activities, Slack had surreptitiously installed a keystroke logger on the computer she used at her job in the Clay County magistrate court's office. At Slack's December 19, 2013 sentencing hearing, U.S. District Court Judge John T. Copenhaver, Jr. considered letters of support and a 700-signature petition when imposing a sentence of 1-2 years' probation and a $1,000 fine. Slack, who could have faced up to five years in prison, resigned from the sheriff's office in September 2013. ■

Modern-Day Slavery in America's Prison Workforce

Why can't we embrace the idea that prisoners have labor rights?

by Beth Schwartzapfel

LAURIE HAZEN HAS BAD TASTE IN MEN. "They're my downfall," the 41-year-old jokes in her Massachusetts accent. "I have to really stay single." An ex-boyfriend first introduced her to prescription drugs, she says, a habit she maintained through the course of another relationship, with another addict, and through two stints in prison, most recently in 2012 for writing fake prescriptions.

When she arrived at the Massachusetts Correctional Institution in Framingham, Hazen left behind a job as a records manager for a fiber-optics company. Her $14-an-hour salary had covered food, utilities and rent on the modest apartment she shared with her boyfriend and her teenage son. She would have been putting some money away, too, if her paycheck hadn't also been covering the couple's drug habit. As it was, like many prisoners, she went to prison with no savings and, because her boyfriend was locked up too, had no one on the outside to send her money. Her son went to live with his dad.

After two weeks in prison, Hazen could apply for a job. Because her sentence was less than a year, she wasn't eligible for the prison's highest-paying job at $20 per week – stitching American flags for the state police – and she had to choose between washing dishes in the kitchen and cleaning bathrooms. Because portions in prison are notoriously small, Hazen took the kitchen job so she could eat a little extra before and after her shifts. She earned $2 a day collecting dirty trays and loading them into the dishwasher during breakfast, lunch and dinner. The cramped room where she worked had no windows and routinely filled with steam from the 200-degree dishwasher. There was one tiny fan. "It was pretty much slave labor," she says, "but there was nothing I could do about that. I needed stamps to write to my child. I needed hygiene products."

About half of the 1.6 million Americans serving time in state and federal prisons have full-time jobs like Hazen did. They aren't counted in standard labor surveys, but prisoners make up a sizable workforce: with 870,000 working prisoners, roughly the same number of workers as in the states of Vermont and Rhode Island combined. Despite decades' worth of talk about reform – of giving prisoners the skills and resources they need to build a life after prison – the vast majority of these workers, almost 700,000, still do "institutional maintenance" work like Hazen's. They mop cellblock floors, prepare and serve food in the dining hall, mow the lawns, file papers in the warden's office, and launder millions of tons of uniforms and bed linens. Compensation varies from state to state and facility to facility, but the median wage in state and federal prisons is 20 and 31 cents an hour, respectively.

Because prisoner workers are not considered "employees" under the law, they have none of the protections that word implies. No disability or worker's compensation in the event of an injury. No Social Security withholdings, sick time or overtime pay. In three states – Texas, Georgia and Arkansas – they work for free. In Texas, where prisoners are required to work under threat of punishment, most do maintenance tasks like Hazen, but some are assigned to "field force" jobs designed to be particularly demeaning. "It wouldn't be an ideal job," says Jason Clark, Texas Department of Criminal Justice public information office director. "Someone may have had disciplinary issues, so they end up in the field force, doing various things including clearing fence lines. They're out under armed-guard supervision, using their labor."

If that scenario sounds familiar, it should. "Thousands of prisoners toil in the hot sun every day and make nothing," says Judith Greene, a researcher and advocate with the nonprofit group Justice Strategies. "Prison guards on horseback, ten-gallon hats, prisoners in their uniforms. It looks like what it is: plantation labor all over again."

Critics trace the current system back to convict-leasing, which historian Douglas

Blackmon calls “slavery by another name.” From the time of Reconstruction until the early to mid-20th century, prisoners – almost all of them black, many convicted of fabricated crimes like “false pretense” or “selling cotton after sunset” – were routinely leased out to private companies to work on plantations and in coal mines and factories. There, they “were compelled to labor without compensation, were repeatedly bought and sold, and were forced to do the bidding of white masters through the regular application of extraordinary physical coercion,” as Blackmon writes.

Conditions in most prison workplaces today are nowhere near as brutal, but the legacy is hard to ignore. Since prisoners are so far removed from the free market, and since their work is barely recognized as such by government agencies that regulate labor, they have little recourse and few protections. The Occupational Safety and Health Administration is one safeguard they do have – federal and some state prisoners “working in conditions similar to those outside prisons” can file an OSHA complaint if their workplace is unsafe – but it’s toothless because, unlike in a free-world workplace, OSHA has to notify prisons in advance of inspections. A 2010 report by the federal Government Accountability Office (GAO) skewered the federal prison system for purposefully hiding from OSHA dangerous practices at an electronics-waste recycling plant where toxic dust sickened hundreds of prisoner workers and officers.

Despite the conditions and the pay, most prisoners want to work. A job gives them a safe place to be for hours each day, provides a break from the monotony of prison life, and – in most states – puts a few dollars and cents in their commissary account. “I was happy to work,” Hazen says. “It made me feel like I wasn’t so much in prison. It gave me a minute by myself to get away from the craziness, time to think and reflect and figure out what I wanted to do with my life.” What the job didn’t provide was a wage sufficient to support her son and accumulate some savings for post-prison life, or job training that would help her pursue the goals she established in that dish room: to study psychology and one day open a domestic violence shelter. After six months of work, Hazen left prison the way most people do: with a criminal record, no meaningful job experience beyond what she went in with and not even enough savings to buy a suit for a job interview ($43).

Study after study has found what common sense would suggest: Prisoners who gain professional skills while locked up, and those who earn a decent wage for their work, are far less likely to end up back behind bars. But if prisons in America, with the world’s highest incarceration rate, had to pay minimum wage – let alone the prevailing wage – they couldn’t keep operating. If prisoners like Hazen weren’t washing dishes in Massachusetts prisons, the state’s corrections department would spend an average of $9.22 to hire someone else to do it (the mean hourly wage for a dishwasher, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics). That’s 30 to 45 times what prisoners make for performing the same service. As a result, prisons – and taxpayers – use prisoners to save hundreds of millions of dollars each year on labor costs, according to the GAO.

“If our criminal justice system had to pay a fair wage for labor that inmates provide, it would collapse,” says Alex Friedmann, managing editor of Prison Legal News. “We could not afford to run our justice system without exploiting inmates.”

If paying prisoners pennies looks like savings to corrections officials, it translates to additional costs for everyone else. Consider, for starters, that more than 1.2 million prisoners have minor children – 2.7 million kids in all. About half of these parents were, like Laurie Hazen, their families’ primary breadwinners before they went to prison. Not surprisingly, their families often turn to social safety-net programs to compensate for the missing income. Families with an incarcerated parent are 50 percent more likely to use Medicaid and twice as likely to use food stamps.

For most, the situation doesn’t improve upon release. Even as state and federal governments pour hundreds of millions of dollars into re-entry initiatives with the aim of easing the transition home and slowing the “revolving door” between prison and the community, they’re undermining successful re-entry by burying prisoners in fees and fines while paying them next to nothing for their work. It costs money to be locked up in America – more and more of it all the time: court costs and fees when you’re tried, booking fees when you’re processed in jail and then prison, and supervision fees while you're out on parole. Restitution costs, child support arrears and, in some states, "room and board costs" pile up during long prison terms. A state-sponsored study of the impact of legal fees in Washington found that the average prisoner owes $2,540 per conviction in fees and fines.

Once a prisoner is released, debt compounds another financial problem: a felony conviction makes job hunting notoriously difficult. That's especially true if you're black, which almost 40 percent of prisoners are. In a seminal 2003 study, only 5 percent of black applicants to entry-level jobs got callbacks if they had a criminal record, one-third as many as black applicants without a record. (Whites with a criminal record were still more likely to be called back than blacks without one).

The combination of debt and poor job opportunities can lead recently-released prisoners right back to prison – neither a cost-effective outcome for the state nor a desirable outcome for, well, anyone. Sometimes people land back behind bars because of their debts alone; the American Civil Liberties Union and New York University's Brennan Center for Justice documented hundreds of cases in which people were reincarcerated as a result of their inability to pay criminal justice debts. In one Ohio county, more than 20 percent of all jail bookings stem from a failure to pay fines – a Dickensian situation that critics liken to modern-day debtors' prisons.

Harvard sociologist Bruce Western is currently conducting a small study on re-entry, following 135 people in Boston's urban neighborhoods during the first year after they're released from Massachusetts prisons. More than half of the people in his sample have not worked a single day in the months since they've been released. They survive instead on $200 a month in food stamps. If they have no friends or family to stay with, they are homeless. "How do you live on zero income?" Western asks. "People appear to be doing that."

For many ex-felons, the only way to dig out of debt is to break the law. New Yorker Glenn Martin was 22 in 1995 when he was sentenced to six years for armed robbery of a jewelry store. In prison, he earned $10.50 for 30 hours of work a week as an administrator at the facility's college program – approximately the same pay as Laurie Hazen earned washing dishes, but with the benefit of providing real job experience. "I learned how to use computers. I kept spreadsheets, helped people register for classes," he says.

He was released in 2000 and took the bus back to Manhattan with just $230 in his pocket. Then he got a break: A non-profit specializing in job placements for people with criminal records helped him land a job as a receptionist at a law firm. It paid $16,000 a year – a far cry from the thousands per day Martin says he used to make "ripping and running the street." But, he says, "I was committed to turning my life around."

His meager pay plus the debts he'd racked up in prison made that practically impossible. When Martin had gone in his son was six months old, and Martin was paying $50 a month in child support, an amount he naively thought would remain fixed during his bid, making paying it off "doable." But later he learned that the judge had issued a default order, increasing his payments to $100 per week plus 9 percent interest. Now he owed $53,000 in arrears, plus the ongoing weekly payments, plus $5,000 in court fees and fines. "It's insurmountable pressure," he says. "Either I do something wrong to pay off the fines and fees, or I relegate myself to a debtors' prison or a lifetime of poverty."

Locking Martin up for six years cost New York taxpayers approximately $360,000. The most cost-effective outcome would be for him to live a lawful life and not be incarcerated again. Yet Martin felt cornered. "I committed crimes," he says matter-of-factly. "The statute of limitations are over, so I think I can say it out loud: I broke the law." Martin says he brought in about $30,000 selling counterfeit designer handbags on eBay – enough to help pay off his debts as he continued to build what has become a successful career. Until recently, Martin oversaw a $1 million budget as public policy director of the Fortune Society, a service and advocacy group for former prisoners. (He left in March 2014 to found his own prison reform group, JustLeadershipUSA).

"The system creates this weird situation where it tells you to do the right thing and turn your life around," Martin says, "and then actually incentivizes future violations of the law – even if you're inspired to do the right thing."

Lately everyone from Attorney General Eric Holder to Senator Ted Cruz has called for reforms to just about every aspect of the system: how we target people for arrest, how we arrest them, how we try them, sentence them, incarcerate them, release them, and supervise and support them once they're home. All are areas ripe for reimagining. But prison labor is not.

In 1985, as "tough on crime" mania was sweeping the country, Supreme Court Chief Justice Warren Burger wrote presciently: "When our country is embarked upon a multibillion dollar prison construction program, it is fair to ask: Are we going to build more expensive human 'warehouses,' or should we change our thinking and move towards factories with fences around them, where inmates can acquire education and vocational training and then produce marketable goods?" History has answered Burger: warehouses. But it doesn't have to be that way. What would happen if Americans decided to treat prison workers like, well, workers?

It's a noisy Wednesday at the Brown Creek metals plant in Polkton, North Carolina. The plant's approximately 55 workers make fire rings for state parks, industrial sinks for school cafeterias, contraband lockers for the police. Some are experts in CAD, computer-aided design. Others are journeyman welders. A 44-year-old man named Joshua* built the plant's plasma burn table from a pile of mail-order parts. Before he went to prison for sexual assault in 1999, Joshua made $15 an hour as a machinist making automobile cylinders; now he makes $15 a week operating the plasma cutter, designing and creating custom metal piecework. During his downtime at work, he uses leftover scrap metal to design and build grandfather clocks that keep remarkably accurate time. One sits next to his workstation, pendulum swinging, marking his time in custody: 15 years down, 8 to go.

This plant and 31 others like it compose the North Carolina Correction Enterprises program, which puts prisoners to work producing goods for sale to "tax-supported entities" like municipal or county governments. Every state, along with the Federal Bureau of Prisons, runs a similar program in which prisoners learn skilled work that can ease their transition to the outside. Modern-day correctional industries date back to the 1930s, when Franklin Delano Roosevelt won the support of a reluctant American Federation of Labor to create Federal Prison Industries, with the dual aim of rehabilitating prisoners and easing the burden on the taxpayer. "If we send men to prison, and don't let them work, the taxpayer must foot the entire bill," the Federal Prison Bureau director told The New York Times. FPI – now more commonly known as UNICOR – sells products exclusively to the federal government, with the aim of minimizing competition with private-sector companies. State correctional industries follow similar rules.

A hybrid between a for-profit business and a rehabilitation program, correctional industries are typically self-supporting: Program revenue, not taxpayers, pays for equipment, supplies, prisoner wages and staff salaries, and profit is rolled back into the program. But the idea is to train workers, not to compensate them; pay is only slightly higher than for prison-maintenance jobs. Still, even the savings Joshua has wrung from his $15 a week has made some difference, he says: "I send my kids money orders and buy them books. I've sent them several hundred dollars over the last couple years. I wish I could send them more." But he has no complaints about the work: "I love making useful things. I do take pride in my work. I do like learning. I would wilt and die if forced to do some job such as folding sheets or slopping trays day in, day out for years."

The iconic prison job, making license plates, is typically a correctional industries job. Prisoners also do telemarketing and data entry. They build office furniture, fill eyeglass prescriptions, manufacture cleaning supplies, and produce clothing – including, in North Carolina, their own uniforms and those of the correctional officers keeping watch over them. Prisoners gentle wild horses in Wyoming, raise water buffalo for mozzarella cheese in Colorado and build motorcycles in Nevada. A men's prison in Chino, California runs a commercial dive school for prisoners, training them to work as commercial divers, underwater welders and heavy-construction riggers – highly specialized jobs that pay upward of $50,000 per year. Their recidivism rate is less than 7 percent, compared to 64 percent of the state's general prison population.

"When we can see a guy come in here with no marketable job skills – the only job he's probably had is street pharmaceuticals – and he learns a skill and takes that skill out when he's released, that's the most rewarding part for me," says Clayton Wright, the plant manager at Brown Creek. The warm metal makes the shop smell like a toaster oven, and the din is so loud that Wright is shouting. "I've been in my office and got phone calls from past inmates: 'I got a job making 30 bucks an hour. I'm so happy.' I've also gotten calls from employers, who ask, 'Do you have any more like so-and-so? He's one of my best.' We're so proud of that."

Programs like North Carolina's are designed with a certain amount of intentional inefficiency, aiming to employ as many prisoners as possible for as many hours as possible. During downtime at the factory, Wright encourages the men to experiment with the materials and equipment; that's how Joshua came to make grandfather clocks.

"What we want to do is, when they're released, for them to feel unnatural not to be working," says Mike Herron, who heads up correctional industries in Indiana. "For you and I, if we go a long period of not working, something's wrong. But they have not lived their life that way. We're trying to change that habit to where they need to work, mentally, just as much as you and I do." Herron's program stands out because almost every job – from cabinetmaker to electrician to housekeeper – comes with a Department of Labor apprenticeship, including one through the Library of Congress in which prisoners produce Braille books for state-run schools for the blind. Apprentices leave prison with documented bona fides that help to counterbalance the difficulty they'll face in job hunting. "These guys are felons, so paper helps them get in the door when they get outside," Wright says.

Research bears him out. One Washington state study found that working in correctional industries significantly reduces future crime rates and that the state saves $6 for every $1 it spends to launch the programs. In Tennessee, the state's correctional industries program, TRICOR, estimates that taxpayers save $3.3 million each year by giving 1,500 prisoner-employees a productive way to occupy their time. On the federal level, prisoners who have worked in correctional industries are 35 percent less likely to land back in prison; a decade later, recidivism in this group was still substantially lower.

But correctional industries, all told, employ only about 60,000 prisoners – less than 4 percent of America's prison population. Why does a program with proven results remain so marginal? Largely because private-sector companies see prisoners doing work that they do, at a fraction of the labor costs, and cry foul.

The thicket of laws and regulations meant to alleviate that complaint – prohibiting most prisoner-made goods from being sold across state lines or in the open market – limits correctional industries' customers and hampers their growth, but it doesn't address the root problem. "If the government would otherwise be buying its pencils from a private vendor," the fact that they get them from prisoners still means that a private pencil vendor is out of a sale, notes Noah Zatz, a University of California, Los Angeles law professor who studies nontraditional employment.

American Apparel, an Alabama manufacturer of military uniforms (not affiliated with the retailer of the same name), says it had to lay off 225 workers in 2012 when it lost a contract to UNICOR. "We pay employees $9 [per hour] on average," American Apparel's Kurt Wilson told CNN Money. "They get full medical insurance, 401(k) plans, and paid vacation. Yet we're competing against a federal program that doesn't pay any of that." Last year Alpine Steel, a Las Vegas company, became the target of competitors' ire when it paid Nevada prisoners minimum wage for work that on the outside would pay $18 or $19 per hour. "Competing against prison labor reduces the number of jobs available in our industry and hampers our businesses from expanding," read a petition from competitor XL Steel and a half-dozen other local steel companies.

Alpine Steel was participating in the one prison work program that does pay competitive wages – at least in theory. The Prison Industry Enhancement Certification Program (PIE) was created in 1979, over labor unions' strong objections, after high-profile prison riots convinced politicians and the public that prisoners needed something useful to do. For the first time since convict-lease programs were outlawed, for-profit companies were permitted to set up factories inside prisons with prisoners as employees. In 38 states, prisoners do mostly factory-style work like packaging products, assembling clothing and building circuit boards. Unlike correctional industries goods, these products can be sold on the open market. To avoid undercutting private-sector wages, companies must pay "prevailing wage" for their particular industry, although in practice this often means minimum wage; then the prison can deduct up to 80 percent of pay for "room and board," victims' compensation and mandatory savings. Still, even with these enormous deductions, PIE jobs are the highest paid in prisons; the top of the pay scale is $16.95 per hour before deductions, according to the National Correctional Industries Association (NCIA), an industry group charged with auditing PIE programs.

The PIE program accounts for fewer than 5,000 jobs – less than 1 percent of working prisoners. Still, the direct link between corporate profit and prison labor – and, by extension, the potential for profit-driven exploitation – has made it a target for criticism.

Proponents of prisoners' and workers' rights point to a push by the American Legislative Exchange Council, or ALEC, to “improve and expand federal prison industries” in several states. Known for its “model laws” crafted in partnership between extreme right-wing legislators and powerful corporations, ALEC drafted the 1995 Texas Prison Industries Act, which expanded the program there and has since been replicated around the country.

A loophole in the federal PIE legislation exempts companies from paying prevailing wage when the work is designated as a “service” rather than a “job,” and a recent exposé on the website Truthout identified at least one company exploiting that loophole to dangerous effect: An Arizona firm, Martori Farms, which supplies produce to Wal-Mart, was paying prisoners $2 an hour for involuntary agricultural work in the desert sun, with inadequate water or sunscreen. [See related article, p. 48].

Labor unions would normally be an obvious advocate for exploited workers like these. But they have traditionally been either openly hostile or uncomfortably silent when it comes to prison labor, since prisoner workers are seen as undercutting wages and competing for work with free-world union members. Neither the AFL-CIO nor the Service Employees International Union has an official position on prison labor. While the AFL-CIO’s deputy policy director Kelly Ross says that “clearly we are in favor of raising standards for prison workers in terms of wages and working conditions,” neither union has organized on behalf of prisoner workers. Union workers in trades and manufacturing, two of prison labor’s primary industries, are already struggling in post-industrial America. Many see prison workers along with sweatshops in China as a threat to their wages and their jobs.

“Jobs are already under attack because of low-cost imports,” said Ann Hoffman of the textile workers’ union UNITE at a 1997 congressional hearing. “Our workers cannot afford to compete with the wages and the lack of benefits that exist in the prisons.”

UNICOR and proponents of state correctional industries argue, of course, that they’re not stealing jobs or suppressing wages. Lockdowns and other prison-related drags on productivity more than make up for the wage savings, NCIA officials say, and besides, they purposefully do a diverse array of work so as to limit their impact on any one industry. Before launching a new program, corrections programs collaborate with state and local agencies to make sure they’re not displacing existing jobs. “In times of high unemployment like we’ve had the last few years, Correctional Industries is even more careful than in good times of employment,” says Gina Honeycutt, executive director of the NCIA.

And ‘round and ‘round the argument goes. When the a priori assumption is that prisoners should not compete for free-world work, the argument is narrow: Opponents say that prisoner labor displaces competitors on the outside, while supporters say it doesn’t.

But the back-and-forth debate elides a larger question: So what if it does? We may all agree that by committing certain crimes, people forfeit their right to be free, at least for a time. Must that also mean they forfeit their right to fair pay for their work? Ultimately, does it serve justice – or benefit the economy – to have so many people released from prison with sizable debts, no job skills and nowhere to turn but to crime or the government safety net?

Those who claim, as many do, that “every job a prisoner has is a job a person in the free world does not have” misunderstand how economies function, according to economists who have studied the issue. Think of these jobs not as a one-for-one swap – there’s only one position, and either I have it or you have it – but rather as a spiral. Economists call it a “multiplier effect”: Unemployment begets unemployment. Communities with high rates of incarceration don’t just lose the workers who go to prison. They lose the money those workers (and their families) spend at the local grocery, banks, restaurants and shops. The impact is felt through generations; studies show that having a parent in prison hampers a child’s prospect of upward economic mobility. If the law required that prisoners be paid wages comparable to peers doing similar work on the outside – what the PIE program is supposed to do – their jobs would have the opposite effect. When the prisoner sent his income home, he’d help create additional jobs.

Paying prisoners a prevailing wage would eliminate the complaint by free-world competitors and labor unions that prison shops are undercutting wages, since the wages would be the same on the inside and on the outside. It would help prisoners make amends for their crimes, too, by allowing them to pay restitution to victims. And it would help them to accumulate some savings so they can rebuild their lives when they’re released.

But prisons have no incentive to pay prisoners better – to the contrary. Unlike workers in the free market, who (theoretically, anyway) can weigh factors like pay, working conditions and other benefits when deciding where to work, prisoners do not have a choice between employers. If they need the money, or the experience, they must take or leave what the prison is offering. “Prison is a deadening, horrific experience, and people line up for these jobs, whether they’re safe or unsafe, exploitative or not,” says Heather Ann Thompson, a Serious financial inquiries only.

Temple University historian who studies labor history and criminal justice.

There is one way to change the system fundamentally: Bring prison jobs under the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA), which sets minimum standards for wages and working conditions.

Don't count on it happening anytime soon. Prison administrators say that paying real wages for real work would make them go bankrupt. Correctional industries administrators say the same thing: If prisoners received the minimum wage, "we wouldn't exist," says Indiana's Mike Herron. "Security costs and other costs are so high." Even with the rising public and political recognition that America's massive prison system is a costly, counterproductive mess, it's inconceivable that lawmakers – who would be assailed by labor, business and tough-on-crime holdouts – will take such a radical step any time in the near future.

Genuine prison labor reform would almost surely have to come through the courts. For decades, prisoners have been asking the judiciary to step in and require that prisons treat their prisoner employees like employees. Countless judges, both state and federal, have held that prisoner workers need not be offered the same rights or protections as free-world workers. But from one ruling to the next, they can't agree on why, exactly.

Some dismiss the claims on their face, concluding, as the 9th Circuit did in 2010, that "the Thirteenth Amendment does not prohibit involuntary servitude as part of imprisonment for a crime." Other judges have grappled with the nature of the work, for instance whether the work is being done inside the prison or outside, as in work release programs. But as UCLA's Zatz points out, "you can have a call center in a prison that's competitive with other call centers. It's sort of irrelevant, physically where it's located." Some judges zeroed in on who is buying the goods – the distinction between public and private customers that correctional industries officials are so careful to make. "Each of these is a kind of attempt to draw a boundary between the world of the prison and the world of the market," Zatz says. "None of them really makes any sense. But you see courts constantly grasping for these kinds of explanations as a way to separate out inmates from regular workers."

Employment law is supposed to rely on a three-pronged test to determine whether two people are engaged in an employee-employer relationship: Are they producing something of value? Are they getting paid for their work? Do they have a supervisor telling them what to do? Prison jobs meet all three criteria. "The puzzle," Zatz says, "is the way in which courts have a strong instinct: No, there's something different here. And then they run around in circles trying to figure out what that something different is."

The something different is a moral judgment: Prisoner workers are seen as less deserving of a decent job or a competitive wage. The courts, in this sense, are reflecting public sentiment. It's why the idea that "law-abiding citizens ... need jobs worse than inmates" (in the words of one recent Nevada editorial page) resonates the way it does. It's the same reason people with felony convictions have such a hard time finding a job, why in so many states they're barred from voting, why a criminal record can prevent you from living in public housing or securing student loans, and why political candidates have long won more votes with punitive rhetoric than with compassion or level-headed talk of prevention. In America, breaking the law has become more than just an occasion to be punished or even rehabilitated. It has become a permanent mark of who you are and what our country thinks you're entitled to earn.

For one brief moment, in 1992, prison labor reform looked possible. Since the 1970s, a group of prisoner workers in Arizona and their lawyer, Michael St. George, had pursued a case further and further up the courts, finally convincing the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, in Hale v. Arizona, that the Fair Labor Standards Act should apply to them. It appeared as though Arizona prisons would have to start paying prisoners minimum wage. The ripple effect would have been enormous: Americans would have been forced not only to rethink their views of prisoners' rights but to reconsider the prison system altogether. The country could not afford to incarcerate 1.6 million people in state and federal prisons if they all had workers' rights.

But it never came to that. The state appealed the decision, the Ninth Circuit reheard the case with 11 judges instead of the original 3-judge panel, and the court overturned its own ruling the following year. Why? When you ask St. George to explain the court's logic, his voice carries decades' worth of weariness: "The Ninth Circuit decided," he says, "that the Fair Labor Standards Act didn't apply to those inmates, because they were prisoners." ■

Texas: Unconstitutional to Revoke Probation Due to Refusal to Self-Incriminate During Polygraph or Therapy

by Matt Clarke

ON MAY 8, 2013, THE TEXAS COURT of Criminal Appeals held that a probationer's term of community supervision cannot be revoked because he had refused to answer incriminating questions while taking a lie detector test or during sex offender group therapy.

Michael Edward Dansby, Sr. received five years on deferred adjudication community supervision (DACS) after he entered into a plea agreement that reduced a charge of aggravated sexual assault to indecency with a child. The DACS conditions required him to complete a sex offender treatment program (SOTP) and submit to polygraph examinations. In the year he was on DACS, Dansby attended over 50 therapy sessions and took two "maintenance" polygraphs designed to ascertain whether he was complying with the requirements of his supervision.

Nine months into his placement on DACS, Dansby was ordered to submit to a polygraph examination to determine his sexual history. When it became apparent that he would be asked questions about prior, un-adjudicated sexual offenses he might have committed, Dansby informed the polygraph examiner that his "attorney told him not to say anything that might result in prosecution." The examiner, who had already explained that he would not ask for the names of victims or locations of sexual offenses, terminated the examination. Dansby was subsequently involuntarily removed from the SOTP. His DACS was then revoked by the trial court for failure to submit to the polygraph examination and failure to complete the SOTP.

Dansby appealed on the basis that he was being required to forfeit his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination to remain on DACS. The Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court, holding that while that argument might be true of the polygraph examination, it was not true of his failure to complete the SOTP in which, according to the appellate court, self-incrimination was not an issue. Dansby filed a petition for discretionary review with the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals, which was granted.

The Court of Criminal Appeals held the lower appellate court had improperly dodged the constitutional issue. Examining the trial court records, the Court noted that no state official had testified that Dansby would have been involuntarily removed from the SOTP had he not refused to answer the polygraph questions about prior offenses. There were other reasons offered for his removal, but they dealt primarily with his refusal to answer potentially incriminating questions about un-adjudicated prior sexual offenses during therapy sessions.

“[I]n our view, neither the fact that there were other relevant factors contributing to [the] ultimate decision to discharge the appellant, nor the fact that appellant’s reticence in group therapy sessions may not have been wholly attributable to a reasonable fear of incriminating himself, necessarily establishes that his discharge from the sex offender treatment program occurred independently of his invocation of the Fifth Amendment privilege,” the Court wrote.

Citing Minnesota v. Murphy, 465 U.S. 420 (1984), the Court of Criminal Appeals noted that a probationer cannot be required to “choose between making incriminating statements and jeopardizing his conditional liberty by remaining silent.” There is an exception to forced testimony if the probationer is offered immunity from prosecution, but such was not the case here. Therefore, the Court clearly stated that, in Dansby’s case, “Without immunity, he simply may not be forced to confess to criminal behavior, whether during a polygraph examination or during group therapy.”

Having found that Dansby would not have been involuntarily removed from the SOTP had he not refused to answer incriminating questions, the judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case remanded to that court for further proceedings. See: Dansby v. State, 398 S.W.3d 233 (Tex. Crim. App. 2013).

Following remand, on January 22, 2014, the Court of Appeals again affirmed the revocation of Dansby’s placement on DACS, finding that because he had failed to raise Fifth Amendment objections to the conditions of his community supervision – including the sexual history polygraph – before the trial court, he had waived the objections.

Although the Court of Appeals agreed that “the Fifth Amendment gave [Dansby] the right not to answer questions that may provide a link to future prosecution, and the fact that he was on community supervision did not affect this right,” his failure to raise those objections before the trial court, despite being “well-represented by counsel,” resulted in “procedural default” that precluded review of his Fifth Amendment claims on appeal.

Therefore, the revocation of Dansby’s placement on DACS was affirmed. The Court of Criminal Appeals granted Dansby’s second petition for discretionary review on June 11, 2014, which remains pending. See: Dansby v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 903 (Tex. App. Jan. 22, 2014), petition for review granted. ■

by Paul Wright

SINCE ITS INCEPTION, PRISON LEGAL NEWS has been reporting on prison slavery and the exploitation of prison slave labor. This month's cover story continues that tradition. As we have repeatedly noted, the 13th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution did not abolish slavery; rather, it limited it to those who have been convicted of a crime – creating what the Virginia Supreme Court once called “slaves of the state.”

It is important to remember the 60,000 prisoners toiling in prison industry programs for little or no pay, and the less than 5,000 prisoners who perform work for private companies. But even more important are the 2.2 million prisoners who have been removed from the U.S. labor market entirely. If these prisoners were counted as part of the labor market, unemployment rates would be far higher than they are today.

The American fixation on prison slave labor is difficult to understand from a rational perspective, since financially it is a money loser. It does a poor job of fulfilling its stated goal of reducing recidivism, and for a police state that constantly whines about the need for total control, passivity and surveillance of the population, both in prison and out, prison industries are a constant source of weapons which contribute to a steady toll of dead prisoners and staff alike, as well as assaults and escape attempts. Yet prison and government officials defend prison industry programs to the death – just not theirs. Meaningful alternatives, such as offering prisoners real world-type employment that pays at least the federal minimum wage of $7.25 an hour, and allowing them to keep all of their earned wages, are not even discussed.

The downside of having published PLN for over 24 years is that with time many of our friends pass away. On July 24, 2014, Edwin “Eddie” Ellis, 72, died in New York City. Eddie was one of PLN's first subscribers. A Black Panther Party member who was framed for a murder he did not commit and who spent 25 years in prison, he never lost his sense of justice, outrage and humor.

When I met Eddie in the mid-2000s for the first time, he told me that one of the highlights of his incarceration was getting PLN in the mail each month. While he was in prison Eddie educated and organized other prisoners. Once he was released he started a non-profit organization called the Center for NuLeadership on Urban Solutions, which advocated for ending mass incarceration and also harnessing the potential of prisoners and ex-prisoners to be part of the solution to American social ills. For many years he hosted On the Count, a weekly radio show on WBAI, which was the only radio show – at least in New York – produced by, for and about prisoners and ex-prisoners.

Eddie was a private person and for a number of years struggled with health issues, which he did not let slow him down. While many will mourn Eddie's passing, and I am one of them, I believe his greatest wish would be not that his death be mourned but that his life be celebrated by continuing the struggle for justice that he spent his life fighting for. Everyone at PLN offers our condolences to his friends and family.

As fall approaches we will be sending out our annual fundraiser, and this year we are mailing our annual report to all PLN subscribers with our request for donations. The Human Rights Defense Center, PLN's parent organization, does much more than just publish Prison Legal News. We advocate for prisoners and their families in the media, the courts, legislatures and other venues, and for a small non-profit organization we have a major impact. Yet for many people, especially our incarcerated supporters, much of this work is invisible.

We document our efforts in our annual report, however, which gives a good overview of the depth and breadth of our activities. Please make a donation to support HRDC and the work we do to protect the human rights of prisoners in the U.S. There are very few organizations doing the work we're doing, and few if any manage to get as much bang for the advocacy buck. All donations to HRDC are tax deductible.

Lastly, our Subscription Madness campaign is continuing until the end of the year (see the ad on page 17). Please help us boost our circulation if you are unable to make a donation; expanding our readership helps keep our costs down and increases the influence and impact we have. Enjoy this issue of PLN, and please encourage others to subscribe. ■

Fighting the High Cost of Prison and Jail Phone Calls!

The Human Rights Defense Center (HRDC) has been reporting on the high cost of telephone calls from prisons, jails and other detention facilities in the U.S. for over two decades in its monthly publication Prison Legal News. An award of funds from the settlement in Judd v. AT&T, a prison phone-related lawsuit, has allowed us to launch the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign (WA PPJ). The goal of the campaign is to eliminate the kickbacks paid by telephone companies to detention facilities and to regulate the exorbitant rates charged to prisoners, their families and others who accept prison phone calls, including attorneys. Video visitation, which is following closely on the same path as the prison phone industry, has also been incorporated into the campaign.

HRDC co-founded the national Prison Phone Justice Campaign in 2011, which resulted in a historic vote by the FCC in August 2013 that capped the rates for interstate (long distance) prison phone calls at $.25/minute for collect calls and $.21/minute for debit and prepaid calls. Those rate caps became effective on February 11, 2014. While this has helped millions of families stay connected across state lines, it did nothing for prisoners incarcerated in Washington State who make local and intrastate (in-state) calls, estimated by the FCC to constitute 85% of all prison and jail calls.

Studies show that a prisoner's ability to communicate with family and friends while incarcerated results in a smoother transition upon release and reduces recidivism. However, excessive phone rates hamper and sometimes eliminate the ability of prisoners to stay in touch with their loved ones.

We need everyone affected by this issue, including prisoners' family members and attorneys, to sign on to the WA PPJ Campaign and tell us how they have been impacted by high prison and jail phone rates. This can be done by accessing the Campaign's website: www.wappj.org. Testimonials and video can be uploaded to the site, or people can call 1-877-410-4863 to record their comments. Or comments can be written and mailed to: HRDC, Attn: WA PPJ Campaign, P.O. Box 1151, Lake Worth, FL 33460. We also need billing records from prepaid accounts (2012 to current) for phone calls received from detention facilities, to demonstrate the actual rates charged to recipients of the calls. Billing records can be emailed to: cwilkinson@humanrightsdefensecenter.org.

Lastly, any donations to fund the campaign are both needed and appreciated; donations can be made at www.prisonphonejustice.org. Only with your support will we be able to end the abusively high costs of prison and jail phone calls in Washington State. Thank you for your support, and please tell others about the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign and encourage them to join!

Private Debt Collection Companies Contract with District Attorney's Offices

by David M. Reutter

NUMEROUS LAWSUITS HAVE BEEN FILED against companies that contract with prosecutors to collect debts in bad check cases because, opponents say, the firms contact debtors on official district attorney letterhead and use draconian tactics such as harassing people and threatening them with jail time if they don't pay the debts they owe plus additional fees.

Consumer protection groups claim the practices used by such companies, including California-based CorrectiveSolutions and Missouri-based BounceBack, would be illegal were it not for legislation passed by Congress following a vigorous lobbying campaign in which one of the companies spent hundreds of thousands of dollars to influence members of the U.S. House and Senate.

Critics say efforts by local governments to reduce costs and increase revenue have driven them to enter into contractual agreements that effectively give private firms law enforcement power and authority over citizens. Such collaborations allow the companies to profit from fees, debt collection and even public safety functions.

Privatization and outsourcing are not new to local governments; many have turned to private companies in recent decades for garbage collection, or to manage utilities such as water or park services. More recently, lured by promises of reduced expenses and new or increased revenue streams, some localities have contracted with companies to perform services that extend to policing efforts and threaten to intrude on civil rights.

Such arrangements go beyond the well-known examples of privately-operated prisons and jails or the privatization of probation services and electronic monitoring for offenders on community supervision. [See, e.g.: PLN, Jan. 2014, p.18; Jan. 2012, p.20].

For instance, the town of Center Point, Alabama contracted with Arizona-based Redflex Traffic Systems, Inc. to set up traffic enforcement cameras in the city. The cameras would take photos of license plates on cars that ran red lights, and citations would be sent to the vehicle owners. The contract became the city's second-largest source of revenue, averaging between $80,000 to $100,000 per month; only sales taxes brought in more money.

The traffic cameras were deactivated in late 2012 after a class-action lawsuit challenged the appeals process for people who received citations through the Redflex program. Several claims were dismissed by a federal court in December 2013 and others were remanded to state court, which denied the defendants' motion to dismiss. The case remains pending. See: Stubbs v. City of Center Point, U.S.D.C. (N.D. Ala.), Case No. 2:13-cv-01200-KOB.

A class-action suit challenging a similar traffic camera program in five towns in New Jersey, also involving Redflex, settled in May 2014. The lawsuit alleged that drivers had been ticketed due to yellow lights that were timed too short. The company agreed to pay $2.1 million plus attorney fees and costs of more than $412,000. See: Spector v. Cherry Hill Township, U.S.D.C. (D. NJ), Case No. 3:12-cv-05198-PGS-LHG.

But far more troubling, civil liberties and consumer advocates say, are agreements between private debt collection agencies and prosecutors' offices. According to the National District Attorney Association, such agreements exist across the nation – from California and Washington to Massachusetts and Maryland.

The two main debt collection firms, CorrectiveSolutions and BounceBack, enter into contracts that allow them to use the letterhead of local district attorney's offices to threaten bad check writers with prosecution and jail time. The companies collect millions of dollars through bad check diversion programs, and prosecutors sometimes get a cut of the fees charged by the firms – giving them a financial incentive to agree to such arrangements.

The collaboration between private companies and prosecutors, which has been ongoing since the 1980s, has led to a plethora of lawsuits.

In 2002, a federal court in Michigan ruled that by using district attorney letterhead and threatening consumers with criminal penalties, a company called Check Enforcement Unit, Inc. had violated the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act and Michigan Collection Practices Act. The court awarded a judgment of $1,000 to the plaintiff – the maximum statutory amount – plus $77,680.44 in attorney fees and costs. See: Gradisher v. Check Enforcement Unit, Inc., 210 F.Supp.2d 907 (W.D. Mich. 2002).

In another case, a federal court in California heard arguments that District Attorney Technical Services, Ltd. (DATS), a debt collection company, charged unlawful fees, pretended to be the district attorney's office and made false threats to arrest bad check writers. The court held that such practices violated the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act and California law. The case resulted in a $741,387.05 judgment against the company and an individual defendant, although DATS filed for bankruptcy and only $160,286.78 was recovered. See: Schwarm v. Craighead, 814 F.Supp.2d 1025 (E.D. Cal. 2011).

American Corrective Counseling Services (ACCS), the predecessor of CorrectiveSolutions, has been sued in California, Florida, Indiana and Pennsylvania – the latter suit resulting in a $2.55 million settlement in 2009. In one case, the California District Attorneys Association filed a friend of the court brief in support of the company.

In San Jose, California, a class-action suit was brought against ACCS and the company's owners, Donald R. Mealing and Lynn R. Hasney, who reportedly made millions by charging fees for a bad check diversion class and imposing other fees on bad check writers. The district court found they had violated the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act by impersonating the district attorney's office in letters and phone calls to debtors, and by claiming they would prosecute anyone who did not pay the fees. See: Del Campo v. American Corrective Counseling Serv., 718 F.Supp.2d 1116 (N.D. Cal. 2010). Following a trial and class decertification, the case settled in May 2014, after 13 years of litigation, for $225,000 to $250,000.

District attorneys have defended their collaboration with private debt collection companies. "It's hugely beneficial to taxpayers because we as prosecutors can then assign resources to more violent crimes and save taxpayers thousands of dollars every year," said Gerald Stewart, the second assistant district attorney in Suffolk County, Massachusetts.

Stephanie Guyotte, a spokeswoman for Middlesex County, Massachusetts District Attorney Gerard Leone, agreed. "Those who have committed a crime of larceny are given the opportunity to not be criminally prosecuted, while the victim merchants have the opportunity to have the matter addressed in lieu of filing a criminal complaint."

However, Paul Arons, an attorney who has filed multiple class-action lawsuits against CorrectiveSolutions, characterized the prosecutors' actions as "unethical."

"This is guilty until proven innocent," he stated. "Their letters [from the debt collection firms] come on letterhead from the district attorneys. That's a lie. They're not from the district attorneys.... What the DAs are doing is renting out their stationery."

Arons also said it is misleading for the companies to threaten bad check writers with criminal prosecution. "It is rare that anyone ever gets prosecuted for a bad check," he noted. "You don't even have to attend the classes as long as you make good on the check."

Consumer advocates worry that the arrangements allow for-profit companies, under the guise of district attorney's offices, to bully accused bad check writers for private gain. In some states, writing a bad check is not a crime unless it was done with the intent to commit fraud.

"I would be surprised if there were not a disproportionate number of low-income, less sophisticated people who get these letters,” said Nadine Cohen, managing attorney for the Greater Boston Legal Services’ consumer rights unit.

Faced with public pressure due to news media coverage, district attorneys in six Massachusetts counties ended their contracts with CorrectiveSolutions and BounceBack in February 2013 out of “an abundance of caution.”

“When I took a look at the letter that goes out, I didn’t feel it was appropriate because it was giving the erroneous impression that it was being sent by me, as opposed to BounceBack,” said David Sullivan, the chief prosecutor in Northwestern County, Massachusetts. “So I pulled the plug.”

David Cotney, the state Commissioner of Banks, had told prosecutors that the debt collection firms were not complying with the Massachusetts Consumer Protection Act; however, bad check writers in Massachusetts continued to receive letters from the companies for another three months.

“It is truly unfortunate that the district attorneys didn’t immediately shut the whole thing down and stop the collectors from fleecing the public, who the DAs are bound to protect,” said Robert Bertling with the Harvard Legal Services Center.

The practice of using private companies to collect bad check debts is highly profitable. A study by The Boston Globe determined that on average, bad check writers in Massachusetts paid roughly double the value of the checks they bounced. In just four counties, for example (Suffolk, Middlesex, Cape and Islands, and Northwestern), CorrectiveSolutions and BounceBack collected a combined $103,216 in bad check debts in 2011. They also collected $107,186 in fees. Almost $9,000 of the fee income was shared with prosecutors.

Matthew Connolly, a former deputy district attorney in Norfolk, Massachusetts, accused prosecutors of abdicating their responsibility by contracting with debt collection firms. “By doing so they are enriching a private company while intimidating people wrongly and charging them exorbitant fees,” he said. “It’s outrageous.”

Nationwide, more than 300 district attorney’s offices have contracts that essentially loan out their letterhead to private collection companies. The impression the companies give – which concerns consumer protection advocates – is that the failure of the bad check writer to respond and pay what they owe, including fees, could lead to criminal charges.

Kathy Pepper accidentally wrote a $68 bad check in the midst of a divorce that made a mess of her finances. She received a letter signed by the district attorney for Santa Clara County, California, advising her that a “bad check restitution program” would allow her to avoid “the possibility of further action ... by the District Attorney’s Office.”

Fearing prosecution, she agreed to pay $170 to attend a “financial accountability” class. The letter had actually been sent by CorrectiveSolutions without a prosecutor determining whether she had committed a crime.

In 2012, The New York Times reviewed five agreements between prosecutors and CorrectiveSolutions. The agreements allowed businesses to send bad checks directly to the company, bypassing the prosecutor’s office altogether. The businesses first had to make an attempt to contact the debtor, but they could turn the bad checks over to a collection agency after only 10 days.

CorrectiveSolutions is by far the larger of the two debt collection firms. The company boasts “over 140 prosecutor offices as customers. Those offices are in jurisdictions with a total population of over 55 million.” Meanwhile, Gale Krieg, a vice president at BounceBack, said his company has contracts with district attorneys in 38 states.

Bad checks are big business. According to data from the Federal Reserve System, about $127 billion in bad checks was incurred nationwide in 2009, though statistics show that number had fallen from $182 billion in 2006.

In the first half of 2012, CorrectiveSolutions sent out 16,955 letters on behalf of the Los Angeles County district attorney’s office. County data indicates that only 635 people attended the company’s diversion classes. There was no oversight by prosecutors.

Priscilla Cruz, an assistant director in the Los Angeles County district attorney’s office, said no one reviews bad check cases before CorrectiveSolutions sends the letters.

Debt collection companies operate with impunity thanks to a loophole created in federal law in 2006 following vigorous lobbying efforts by proponents of bad check repayment programs, CorrectiveSolutions, BounceBack and the National District Attorneys Association. An exemption was added to federal law for debt collection firms representing prosecutors, despite opposition from Public Citizen, the National Consumer Law Center and other consumer advocacy groups.

With only a few qualifying criteria, the exemption allows debt collection companies to use district attorney letterhead to send letters to bad check writers, threaten them with jail time and collect fees.

According to ProPublica, CorrectiveSolutions spent more than $660,000 on lobbying between 2003 and 2006, and made donations to key U.S. Senators such as Sen. Christopher Dodd, and prominent House members such as Rep. Barney Frank – then a member of the House Financial Services Committee. Rep. Frank said he supported the exemption because bad check programs help people avoid criminal records.

Yet critics claim that some district attorneys appear to have delegated their “prosecutorial discretion” – the decision as to which cases to prosecute – to debt collection firms. And as partnerships between private companies and prosecutors proliferate, more and more people risk having their rights and freedom determined by corporations that are primarily concerned with generating profit.

Meanwhile, lawsuits continue to challenge the practices of private debt collection companies that collude with district attorney's offices.

A class-action suit filed in federal court in the Northern District of California settled in March 2014, with a member class of around 500,000 consisting of "all individuals who received written communications in connection with Bad Check Diversion Programs operated by National Corrective Group or American Corrective Counseling Services in California between January 4, 2006 and August 31, 2011 or in Pennsylvania between January 25, 2004 and August 31, 2011." Pursuant to the settlement, the defendants agreed to pay $3.25 million, inclusive of $700,000 in attorney fees and costs. See: Smith v. Leichtman, U.S.D.C. (N.D. Cal.), Case No. 10-cv-00010-JSW.

And on July 18, 2014, a class-action lawsuit was filed in Washington state against BounceBack and its parent company, Stone Fence Holdings, claiming violations of the state Consumer Protection Act and the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act. According to Courthouse News Service, BounceBack "rented" county prosecutor's seals to threaten consumers with jail time unless they paid alleged debts, and gave the prosecutors a share of the collection fees." See: Cavnar v. BounceBack, Inc., U.S.D.C. (E.D. Wash.), Case No. 2:14-cv-00235-RMP.

Due to such lawsuits and media coverage, public officials are starting to take action. In June 2013, Oregon Governor John Kitzhaber signed into law a bill that ended bad check diversion programs involving private companies and prosecutors' offices in that state. The law went into effect in January 2014; a similar bill was introduced in Washington in 2013, but failed to pass. ■

Our Subscription Madness promotion has been so successful in the past that we have decided to offer it again!

PLN is offering a discount on blocks of 2 or 4 one-year subscriptions for any person not a current or former subscriber who has a US address, whether they are imprisoned or not. Subscription Madness is the only opportunity attorneys, librarians and corrections professionals have to receive a PLN subscription at a fraction of the normal rate of $90 per year, and for prisoner family members and concerned activists to subscribe at a steep discount from the normal rate of $35 per year. Prisoner subscriptions are also less than the normal $30 per year. Check out these discounts!

- $50 buys 2 one-year subscriptions ($25 each)
- $80 buys 4 one-year subscriptions ($20 each)

If you want to take advantage of Subscription Madness but are stumped for people to send them to, PLN can provide names of indigent prisoners who would love a PLN subscription. Use a separate piece of paper to order by mail, call our office to order with a credit card, or go to our website to order online. No Renewals! Sorry, but Subscription Madness is for new one-year subscriptions only, and cannot be used to renew or extend a current or former subscription. PLN is a 501(c)(3) non-profit. (Subscription Madness 2014 expires 12-31-2014).

CCA Has Long History of Wage Violations, Poor Treatment of Employees

ON AUGUST 20, 2014, CORRECTIONS Corporation of America (CCA), the nation's largest for-profit prison operator, issued a press release that attempted to put a positive spin on over $8 million in back wages the company had agreed to pay to employees at one of its facilities.

According to the U.S. Department of Labor (DOL), CCA had paid 30 to 40 percent less than required under rules for federal contractors to workers at the company's California City Correctional Center. CCA was also accused of failing to make required payments to employees' retirement and health and life insurance accounts, as well as violations related to "inaccurate recording of breaks, lunches and overall hours worked," according to the Associated Press. Some employees will receive more than $30,000 in back pay.

"The people that get these federal monies from a federal agency to get one of these contracts have to abide by the wage rates," stated Eduardo Huerta, assistant director of the DOL's wage and hour division.

CCA claimed the $8 million payment for back wages was due to a "retroactive contract modification" by federal officials, and said it had "diligently" and in "good faith" worked with the Department of Labor to ensure employees received the pay they were owed.

"We greatly value our employees and the important work that they do to keep our communities safe and secure," said CCA spokesman Steve Owen.

However, the company did not mention that it has repeatedly been sued by its own employees for failing to pay required wages. In fact, CCA settled an earlier wage and hour lawsuit involving the California City Correctional Center for an undisclosed amount in 2004, and has paid millions to resolve other wage-related cases over the past dozen years.

Most recently, on August 13, 2014, a federal court in Kentucky unsealed a settlement in a wage and hour lawsuit filed against CCA. The case had settled in November 2013, with the company agreeing to pay $260,000 to 25 shift supervisors who claimed they were denied overtime and required to work extra hours without compensation.

The settlement was unsealed – over CCA's objections – after Prison Legal News intervened in the case to make the settlement public. The district court held that CCA had failed "to overcome the presumption in favor of permitting public access" to the settlement, and thus it "must be open to public inspection." PLN was represented by the ACLU of Kentucky. See: Johnson v. CCA, U.S.D.C. (W.D. Ky.), Case No. 3:12-cv-00246-JGH.

Also, in August 2009 the U.S. District Court for the District of Kansas unsealed a $7 million settlement agreement in a class-action wage and hour lawsuit against CCA. The suit, brought under the Fair Labor Standards Act, alleged that CCA had required some employees to perform work duties "without compensating them for all such hours worked." Specifically, the company was accused of not paying correctional officers and other employees for pre- and post-shift work that included roll calls, obtaining weapons and equipment, attending meetings and job assignment briefings, and completing paperwork. Again, the settlement was made public, over CCA's objections, after Prison Legal News intervened to unseal details of the agreement, which applied to more than 30,600 potential class members nationwide. [See: PLN, Jan. 2010, p.20; Oct. 2009, p.31].

"The public has a right to know how its tax dollars are being spent when government agencies contract with for-profit companies like CCA to operate prisons and jails, especially when such companies are accused of violating the law to increase their profit margins," said PLN managing editor Alex Friedmann.

Additionally, according to records produced by CCA, in 2002 the company paid $2 million to resolve three federal lawsuits filed by employees in Mississippi under the Fair Labor Standards Act. And according to a report issued last year by Grassroots Leadership, titled "The Dirty Thirty: Nothing to Celebrate About 30 Years of Corrections Corporation of America," in 2000 the company had settled lawsuits alleging wage and hour violations at the CCA-operated Winn Correctional Center in Louisiana and San Diego Correctional Facility in California.

The company has also faced litigation related to employment discrimination, retaliation and sexual harassment at its for-profit prisons.

For example, CCA entered into a consent decree with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) on October 1, 2009, agreeing to pay $1.3 million to settle allegations of sexual harassment and retaliation involving female employees at the Crowley County Correctional Facility in Colorado, operated by Dominion Correctional Services and later by CCA.

According to the lawsuit, female staff members were subjected to "unlawful sexual harassment and gender-based harassment." The complaint alleged female employees had been hired based on whether they might be "easy to get to bed." After being hired they were "routinely groped, pawed, and physically assaulted by male management and male co-workers." Those who complained were subjected to retaliation, such as false charges to justify retaliatory discipline, assignments to areas where there was an increased risk of harm and intentionally assigning female employees to work with their alleged harassers, exposing them to "actual and threatened abuse." [See: PLN, May 2010, p.46].

Further, in 2007, CCA paid $438,000 to settle claims of discriminatory hiring practices at the company's Central Arizona Detention Center in Florence; the U.S. Department of Labor said CCA had violated federal law by disproportionately rejecting non-Hispanic job applicants who sought employment during a two-year period. The company agreed to hire 16 applicants who had been rejected, but denied any wrongdoing. [See: PLN, Sept. 2007, p.25].

And in 2002, CCA settled a gender discrimination suit by agreeing to pay $152,000 in back wages to 96 women who had applied for jobs at the company's facility in Sayre, Oklahoma but were not hired. The settlement was reached after an audit by the U.S. Department of Labor found that female applicants with equal or better qualifications than their male counterparts had been rejected due to their gender. [See: PLN, May 2003, p.13].

According to a list of lawsuits filed against CCA, produced by the company itself, CCA has also settled dozens of individual complaints brought by current and former employees raising claims of sexual harassment, discrimination and wrongful termination.

Additionally, a federal jury in Oklahoma found that CCA had violated the rights of a military veteran by failing to retain his job position after he returned from a tour of duty in Iraq. Jurors recommended in August 2010 that the company pay veteran Dennis Weems around $53,000 for violating the Uniformed Services Employment and Re-employment Rights Act, which prohibits employers from denying re-employment, retention in employment, promotion or any benefit of employment to a member of the military on the basis of their military service. See: Weems v. CCA, U.S.D.C. (E.D. Okla.), Case No. 6:09-cv-00443-JHP.

An attorney for CCA admitted that mistakes had been made in that case, while Weems claimed CCA had violated the rights of other veterans who returned to their jobs at the company following military service – such as re-hiring them at lower pay rates.

"It appears that in some cases, CCA treats its own employees with the same disdain that it treats prisoners held in the company's for-profit facilities," said Friedmann, who served six years at a CCA-operated prison in Tennessee in the 1990s.

In May 2013, at CCA's annual shareholder meeting, Friedmann had requested a brief moment of silence for company employee Catlin Carithers, who had been killed during a riot at the Adams County Correctional Facility in Mississippi. His request was flatly denied by CCA board president John Ferguson. [See: PLN, June 2014, p.48].

"CCA holds a shareholder meeting just once a year, and they couldn't give 30 seconds to honor the memory of one of their own who died in the line of duty," Friedmann said at the time. "That is callous and insensitive. It is also indicative of the value that CCA places on its employees."

Apparently, that value is fairly low. ■

Do Residency Bans Drive Sex Offenders Underground?

by Steven Yoder

EARLY LAST YEAR, LOS ANGELES SET aside a sliver of land in its Harbor Gateway neighborhood for the city's newest and smallest park: two jungle gyms on a fifth of an acre.

The project was more than just an effort to increase the city's green space. City Council members made clear that one of the park's principal reasons for existence was to force 33 people on the California sex offender registry who were living in a nearby apartment building to move out. State law bars those on its registry from living within 2,000 feet of a park or school.

"We came together, working with the police department, to problem-solve, to send a message that Harbor Gateway cannot be dumped upon with a high number of registered sex offenders," councilman Joe Buscaino said at the park's opening.

But the state ban itself already clusters registrants into a limited number of areas, according to a September 2011 report by the California Sex Offender Management Board, which was created by the state legislature to advise it on sex offender policies.

California hasn't been alone in its tough approach to ensuring that formerly incarcerated sex offenders pose no danger after they are released. As part of a wave of new sex offender laws starting in the mid-1990s, about 30 states and thousands of cities and towns passed such residency restrictions – prompting in turn a pushback from civil liberties advocates, state legislators and registrants themselves who argued the restrictions were not only unduly harsh but counterproductive.

But a court decision in Colorado last year could mark a shift in momentum.

In the Colorado case, Stephen Ryals, a high school soccer coach convicted in 2001 for a consensual sexual relationship with a 17-year-old student, was sentenced to seven years' probation and put on the state sex offender registry.

Eleven years later, in 2012, he and his wife bought a house in the city of Englewood. But the police department told him he couldn't live there because of a city ordinance prohibiting sex offenders from living within 2,000 feet of schools, parks and playgrounds – a law that effectively made 99 percent of its homes and rentals off limits to offenders.

Englewood police also warned offenders that even in the open one percent, if they contacted a homeowner whose property wasn't for rent or for sale, they could be charged with trespassing.

Ryals sued, and last August a federal court concluded that the city's ban went too far. [See: Ryals v. City of Englewood, 962 F.Supp.2d 1236 (D. Colo. 2013)].

The judge ruled that it conflicted with the state's existing system for managing and reintegrating sex offenders and could encourage other towns and cities to do the same, effectively barring offenders from the entire state. Englewood has appealed, but two of the state's five other cities that have residence bans have softened their restrictions since the decision.

The other three are awaiting the outcome of the appeal, according to John Krieger of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) of Colorado, which represented Ryals.

Rolling Back Restrictions

IN CALIFORNIA, SCORES OF CITIES ARE rolling back their restrictions after an Orange County court ruled in favor of registrant Hugo Godinez, who challenged the county over its ordinance barring sex offenders from entering parks.

Godinez, convicted for a misdemeanor sex offense in 2010, was arrested the following year for what he said was mandatory attendance at a company picnic in a county park. In that case too, a state appeals court decided that the county's ordinance usurped the state's authority. The appeals court ruling was upheld by the state's highest court in April 2014. [See: People v. Godinez, 2014 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 159, review denied].

Since the Godinez decision, 28 California cities that have similar "presence" restrictions, which ban offenders from entering places like libraries and parks, have repealed those rules. Another 24 say they are revising their ordinances, according to Janice Bellucci, a California attorney.

Since the April decision, Bellucci, who represents the advocacy group California Reform Sex Offender Laws, has sent letters demanding repeal to cities with presence restrictions. She also has sued a dozen other cities that haven't changed their rules since the decision.

And this year, California's Supreme Court could make an even bigger ruling – whether to toss the state's 2,000-foot law itself.

A Los Angeles County Superior Court judge found it unconstitutional in 2010, but the city appealed. The judge cited an increase in homelessness among registrants as a key reason. Statewide, the number of homeless registrants has doubled since the law passed in 2006, according to the 2011 Sex Offender Management Board report.

At least two other states – Rhode Island and New York – have been sued since 2012 over their own residency laws.

One finding in the Ryals' case in Colorado could resonate in other states.

The judge found compelling a 2009 white paper by Colorado's Sex Offender Management Board that concluded residency bans don't lower recidivism and could actually increase the risk to the public. According to the paper, that's because they drive offenders underground or toward homelessness, making them harder for police and probation officers to track.

Often the most stable place for an offender to live is with family members. But if they have homes in prohibited areas, the offender might instead try to drop off the registry by failing to report their permanent address, says Sara Neel of the Colorado ACLU. The problem, which isn't specific to Colorado, could strengthen court challenges in other states, she says.

Those 2009 findings led the Colorado board to go further in a report this January, which recommended that state lawmakers consider legislation prohibiting cities and towns from enacting their own offender residency rules.

Two other states have moved in that direction. The Kansas legislature banned local residency restrictions in 2010. And in New Hampshire, the state House of Representatives has twice approved a bill that would bar local ordinances, though it's died both times in the state Senate.

Bellucci argues that there's more to come in other states. The "pendulum of punishment," she claims, is starting to swing the other way.

"For a long time, ever-harsher sex offender laws were being passed and there was no one opposing them," she told The Crime Report. "After more than a few lawsuits, elected officials are realizing that there's a downside to this." (A spokesperson for the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children, which has supported stronger sex offender laws like the federal Adam Walsh Act, said it had no one available to comment on the center's position on residency restrictions).

Sponsors of the New Hampshire bill say they'll keep trying, and it's gained some unlikely allies.

"My first term, I was pretty much a hard-liner," said Republican representative Larry Gagne during a January committee hearing.

"I said, 'Put [sex offenders] in outer space; put them all on an island.' But I changed my mind after a [police] sergeant came in and said, 'If they go underground, we can't find them.'"

Steven Yoder writes about criminal justice, immigration and other domestic policy issues. His work has appeared in Salon, The Fiscal Times, The American Prospect and elsewhere, and he's working on a book about the impact of sex offender registries on registrants' families.

Settlement Opens Georgia Courtrooms to the Public

by David M. Reutter

HUMAN RIGHTS GROUPS HAVE APPLAUDED efforts to open Georgia courts to members of the public, putting an end to a widespread practice of courtrooms being declared off limits – a practice that was condemned as a violation of the Sixth Amendment because it erodes the public's right to observe the judicial system.

In November 2013, Superior Court judges in the Cordele Judicial Circuit – which includes Ben Hill and Crisp counties – agreed to a settlement that resolves a class-action suit filed on behalf of citizens who were prohibited from attending court hearings. The lawsuit was brought by the Atlanta-based Southern Center for Human Rights (SCHR). See: Fuqua v. Pridgen, U.S.D.C. (M.D. Ga.), Case No. 1:12-cv-00093-WLS.

The settlement followed two rulings by U.S. District Court Judge Louis Sands, who denied motions to dismiss the class-action suit.

"Judge Sands has clearly stated that the public has a right to view court proceedings, and after a long and hard road, the judges in Ben Hill and Crisp counties have finally seen the light," said SCHR attorney Gerry Weber. "A closed courtroom is one that is less accountable to the public. What is done behind closed doors can be different to what is done in the cold light of day," he added.

Pursuant to the settlement, among other provisions the parties agreed that "The First Amendment requires all pre-trial proceedings held in Ben Hill and Crisp counties, whether in jail courtrooms or elsewhere, be presumptively open to the public." Further, courtrooms should not be closed unless there are "documented findings of fact justifying a compelling interest in the public's exclusion in a particular case, and the consideration of narrowly tailored alternatives to closure." The defendants also agreed to pay $40,000 in attorneys' fees to the SCHR.

The class-action lawsuit, filed in June 2012, alleged that defendants' family members and friends – and in one case even a pastor – had been prohibited from attending court sessions. According to the complaint, members of the public were barred unless they could show they were related to defendants who were appearing in court.

Judges had cited limited space in law enforcement center courtrooms, as well as security concerns related to transporting defendants to county courthouses where larger courtrooms were available, as reasons for restricting court attendance to defendants' family members.

The settlement addressed this issue, stating: "In order to access public courtrooms, citizens need not answer questions from court or law enforcement staff, and Defendants must not demand that persons seeking entry explain who they are and their reasons for seeking entry in courtrooms."

In other positive steps, Fulton County Superior Court Judge Christopher Brasher quickly put a stop to the practice of closing courtrooms to the public after discovering it was occurring in his court. Brasher blamed "overzealous deputies," and ordered that no member of the public be denied access to his courtroom.

Fulton County Superior Court Judges Todd Markle and Robert McBurney also said they were unaware that the public was being barred from entering their courts, and that they had not given their approval for such practices.

Jeffrey Davis, director of Georgia's Judicial Qualifications Commission (JQC), said the commission had issued a formal opinion in August 2013 after receiving numerous complaints from citizens who were denied access to courtrooms.

"Our efforts to educate judges about these issues have resulted in the type of response we would have anticipated," Davis said. "Judges are complying with the opinion and modifying practices accordingly. Since the issuance of our opinion, we have been encouraged by the response of judges and the willingness to bring their courts into full compliance with the law."

The argument that space in courtrooms is limited and security is threatened by moving defendants to larger county courthouses had been cited by a multitude of judges across Georgia who routinely barred members of the public from their courtrooms, according to a JQC report released following an investigation.

The report found that signs were posted on courtroom doors across the state, denying access to either the public in general or specific groups such as children. In many courts, the report said, bailiffs blocked entry to courtrooms even though members of the public have a legal right to attend court sessions.

"We've had our own investigators and commissioners go out and visit a courtroom and they have been greeted by a bailiff or a deputy sheriff and been told to state their business or otherwise they don't need to be there," said Marietta attorney Robert Ingram.

DeKalb, Cobb, Fulton and Towns counties have had courtroom closures challenged in state appellate courts.

"Openness, of course, is such a basic principle of the law in Georgia jurisprudence and U.S. constitutional jurisprudence," noted JQC Chairman John Allen. "You erode the confidence in the integrity and fairness of the courts by closing the courts as a matter of course."

However, prior to the JQC's opinion, Davis said it was "the modus operandi around the state for courts to have deputies who question those who are simply in the court without business before the court." He added, "People ought to be able to watch their government in action. And justice which is done in secret – or a feeling by those who are coming to the courthouse that somehow they don't have a right to be there – chills the public's ability not only to access the courts, but also to have confidence in the judicial system."

In Presley v. Georgia, 130 S.Ct. 721 (2010), the U.S. Supreme Court held that trial courts have an obligation "to take every reasonable measure to accommodate public attendance at criminal trials." That case, which reversed a ruling by the Georgia Supreme Court, involved a DeKalb County judge's closure of her courtroom during jury selection.

But in 2011, a year after the Presley decision, DeKalb County State Court Chief Judge Wayne Purdom posted signs limiting access to his courtroom on days he took jail pleas, when numerous prisoners were in court and on arraignment days. At those times members of the public were admitted only "by request."

DeKalb County State Court Judge Barbara Mobley resigned in 2011 when faced with a 16-count JQC complaint that included allegations she had interfered with the public's right of access to her court. She was accused of "Directing courtroom bailiffs and other court personnel to question members of the public, and the bar, who are merely observing courtroom proceedings, and requiring them to identify themselves and state their business before the court, thereby chilling the public's right to observe matters before the court and restricting the public access to the court."

Atlanta attorney Brian Steele has pursued appeals in two cases involving the closure of courtrooms to the public. In a case strikingly similar to Presley, Steele challenged the barring of the public from jury selection during the 2009 rape trial of Corsen Stewart, including Stewart's mother, who was prohibited from entering the courtroom during voir dire.

Steele said he plans to use Stewart's appeal to try to overturn a 2010 Georgia Supreme Court ruling in the murder conviction of Travion Reid. In Reid's case, the trial court closed the courtroom during the testimony of two witnesses whom prosecutors said feared for their safety. The state Supreme Court refused to overturn the conviction because neither Reid nor his attorney had objected to the closure, but Chief Justice Carol Hunstein wrote in a dissenting opinion that it was not Reid's responsibility to object.

"Although the majority concludes that Reid has not shown prejudice," Hunstein stated, "Reid is not required to do so in order to obtain relief for a structural error which was a violation of the public-trial right." See: Reid v. State, 286 Ga. 484, 690 S.E.2d 177 (Ga. 2010).

In the second case, a Towns County judge moved jury selection in a criminal case to a church and barred the public – including the defendant's wife and daughter – from attending. Steele asked an appellate court to reverse the conviction and order a new trial on that basis, but the justices instead granted a new trial on other grounds in 2011 and did not address the courtroom access issue.

In the Georgia Supreme Court's initial decision in the Presley case, then-Chief Justice Leah Ward Sears had noted in a dissenting opinion that lack of space is an inadequate reason to close a courtroom. "A room that is so small it cannot accommodate the public," she wrote, "is a room that is too small to accommodate a constitutional criminal trial."

Sears, who is now in private practice, said she sympathizes with judges dealing with small courtrooms that they are trying to keep secure. She sees a more important value at stake, however. "Public access is one of the cornerstones of our democracy," she said. "It's what keeps us free." ■

Sentence Reductions for “Snitching” Undermine U.S. Justice System

by Derek Gilna

IMAGINE THIS SCENARIO: DRUG ENFORCEMENT Administration (DEA) agents bust a small-time drug dealer for, let’s say, nickel-and-diming in heroin. They take him to booking, run his fingerprints and discover this is his third arrest. As a multiple offender facing a long stretch in prison and with a public defender at his side, the suspect offers a deal.

“Cut my sentence,” he says, “and I’ll give you my distributor.”

The lead agent and his partner glance at each other. Here it is: a chance to nail the slippery kingpin who runs a multi-million dollar heroin ring that covers three states, but who has somehow managed to elude capture again and again. Never mind that coincidentally their case-closure rate will skyrocket, making them look good. There is a brief pause as the lead agent again glances at his partner, then back at our suspect.

“Done,” he states, closing the deal.

Fiction, you say? The oft-repeated storyline to the take-your-pick selection of seemingly endless TV crime dramas?

You might think so, and you’d be right. But in the daily trenches of law enforcement, this scenario is not as far-fetched as it appears. In fact, wheeling and dealing is more of a way of life than many police officers and prosecutors care to openly admit. It is, quite simply, the practice of using snitches to obtain convictions. [See: PLN, June 2010, p.1; Feb. 2006, p.28].

But wait, you say. What about the old saying, “snitches get stitches?” Don’t rats end up at the bottom of the nearest river? If that’s true, then the river bottom is a very crowded place.

Nationwide, court records indicate that 25% of offenders sent to federal prison for drug-related crimes provided information to prosecutors in exchange for shorter sentences. In some jurisdictions, like Idaho, Colorado and the Eastern District of Kentucky, more than half did. Sometimes these sentence reductions can amount to 50% or more, according to the U.S. Sentencing Commission.

Given that incentive, it’s inevitable that some prisoners would find a way to profit from such a dysfunctional system. According to a 2012 USA Today investigation that examined hundreds of thousands of court cases, “snitching has become so commonplace that in the past five years at least 48,895 federal convicts – one out of every eight – had their prison sentences reduced in exchange for helping government investigators....”

Citizens who live their lives happily ignorant of the criminal justice system are unaware that it is a closed loop, starting at the top. Judges, many of whom are former prosecutors and who draw their paychecks from the same government that pays the police and prosecution, are generally hesitant to cast doubt on the legitimacy of their brethren’s crime-fighting methods. Further, judge-made case law over the years has upheld the right of the police to use almost any tactic to solve crimes, including lying and the use of informants.

As a result, prosecutors at both the state and federal levels face few checks upon their power. Knowing that jurors fear crime and seek safer neighborhoods, U.S. Attorneys and their local district attorney counterparts gather information to use as evidence in criminal cases from whomever they can, including prisoners seeking to shorten their sentences.

The incarcerated – and the people who guard them – know there are few secrets in jail or prison. People talk about everything, including their cases. The more canny and opportunistic prisoners realize from firsthand experience that prosecutors “pay” well with sentence reductions for information on someone they have insufficient evidence to convict.

To the naïve or uninitiated, law enforcement, in its battle against crime, should be able to use every tool at its disposal. If that means relying on testimony from one criminal to convict another, so be it. Except in the most obvious cases of prosecutorial overreach, juries hold their collective noses and vote guilty, ignoring misgivings about the source of the incriminating “proof” or the motives of the jailhouse snitch who takes the stand against a defendant.

However, the USA Today investigation that examined the culture of snitching questioned the usefulness of such testimony and cast doubt on whether it serves the ends of justice.

Justice, in its purest form, relies on truth – but within the snitching community, truth is a rare commodity and can be the first casualty in a system that seems more interested in obtaining convictions than dispensing justice. Prosecutors eager to close a case often reward criminals with sentence reductions for inaccurate, manufactured or questionable “evidence” or testimony against another offender.

The case of federal prisoner Marcus Watkins is one example of the unintended consequences of the institutionalized culture of snitching. According to USA Today, "For a fee, [Watkins] and his associates on the outside sold ... information about other criminals that they could turn around and offer up to federal agents in hopes of shaving years off their prison sentences."

Watkins' case is not the only one of its kind, but certainly one of the most documented. His outside associates collected and offered to sell information about the drug trade to fellow prisoners at the Atlanta City Detention Center, most of whom had the money, and incentive, to pay for it. And they were not the only customers; according to Watkins, "the biggest buyer of information is the government." Only the currency was different. "They pay in years," Watkins said, claiming that federal agents he spoke with "knew money's been changing hands. They basically authorized all of this."

Robert McBurney, a former federal prosecutor from Atlanta, called it "a pernicious situation that sadly, undid some good works," but FBI agent Mile Brosas testified under oath that agents acted "just based on the names that Mr. Watkins gave us." At the time Watkins provided the information and names referred to by Brosas, he had already been behind bars for some time. Therefore, the logical assumption would have been that he was receiving his information from outside the prison – though that did not deter the prosecutors who relied on that information in other criminal cases.

The court was not amused. The then-chief judge of the federal district court in Atlanta, Judge Julie E. Carnes, decried the "abominable situation" of such information peddling, stating she was "appalled that it's going on to the level it appears to be going on."

And Watkins' case is clearly not an isolated example. As noted by Professor Tim Saviello at the John Marshall Law School in Chicago, "People are willing to pay $20,000 or $30,000 to get a piece of information. That tells you how valuable it is."

The pressure to snitch is overwhelming. Suspects accused of federal crimes almost always accept plea bargains. Those who don't are generally convicted at trial, and the lengthier sentences they typically receive for refusing to plead guilty are known as the "trial penalty." For someone in such a position, who may be facing a mandatory minimum prison term of 10 to 20 years, informing on fellow criminals is their only chance at leniency.

The fact remains that most prisoners serving time for drug offenses are not major players in the drug trade. In 1995, the U.S. Sentencing Commission found that only 11% of federal drug trafficking defendants were major traffickers; the rest were lower-level offenders. Even "safety-valve" modifications to the mandatory minimum sentencing guidelines did little to reduce the explosion in the number of prisoners convicted of drug crimes. Such offenders are under pressure to offer “substantial assistance” to the government, often in the form of information about other drug dealers, as a means of obtaining sentencing relief. During the past five years, fully one-third of drug traffickers sentenced in federal court received sentence reductions for providing “substantial assistance.”

Drug conspiracy laws enacted in 1988 also contributed to the influx of federal drug offenders, allowing the government to win convictions for what prisoners often term “ghost drugs,” by swearing that any information provided was about a suspect who was part of the snitch’s drug ring. Unfortunately, such a system can snare innocent bystanders – defendants who become the victims of lies told by their codefendants who have figured out how to manipulate the sentencing laws in order to reduce their own prison terms.

One of the most egregious examples of misuse of the justice system by both police and prosecutors occurred in Louisiana, where the Colomb family suffered years of prosecution, imprisonment and economic disaster that began with a minor drug possession charge against the teenaged son of Ann Colomb, the family matriarch. According to court filings, prosecutors claimed that Colomb and her sons, living on a mostly black street in a white section of the town of Church Point, Louisiana, ran a $70 million drug operation.

The trouble started when two of Colomb’s sons, Sammie and Edward, pleaded no contest to felony possession and received probation. Church Point, like many southern towns, suffered from documented racial tensions, heightened by the fact that another Colomb son, Danny, dated a white woman. According to Rodney Baum, the Colomb family lawyer, “They took a bunch of unrelated police harassments of these people over 10 years, coupled it with a parade of jailhouse snitches.... It was ridiculous.” The federal prosecutor, U.S. Attorney Bret Grayson, used more than 30 imprisoned informants to compile his evidence of a drug conspiracy.

As the case neared trial, U.S. District Court Judge Tucker Melancon began having misgivings and sought to bar many of the informants from testifying. The case, despite being already weakened by a lack of hard evidence and the fact that Colomb family members had continued to work construction and oilfield jobs while supposedly netting millions in the illicit drug trade, moved forward. The jury convicted the family in 2006 and they went to prison.

Then another convicted federal prisoner, Quinn Alex, in a letter to his former prosecutor, revealed the scope and details of a snitching-for-hire scheme at the Federal Correctional Institution in Three Rivers, Texas, the source of the information used by U.S. Attorney Grayson in the Colomb case. A motion for a new trial soon followed, and Judge Melancon vacated the convictions and freed the family.

The Colombes were “fortunate,” as they were released from prison and justice prevailed. But under any definition of justice they shouldn’t have been convicted in the first place, and the case vividly demonstrated the unintended consequences of the snitching industry that is firmly entrenched in the U.S. justice system. Ann Colomb expressed it best: “What happened to us should never happen to anyone. It breaks my heart....”

But the real victim is justice itself, in the form of wrongful convictions, official corruption, public deception and the weakened legitimacy of the criminal justice system in the eyes of the public. The use of snitches has become so prevalent that the practice and its damaging effects are the subject of a book, Snitching: Criminal Informants and the Erosion of American Justice, by Alexandra Natapoff, published in April 2011.

Under such scrutiny the practice of snitching, spurred by harsh sentencing laws and win-at-any-cost prosecutors, might gradually fade. Snitching has already faced a backlash due to a controversial DVD series called “Stop Snitching,” created by Ronnie Thomas, a Baltimore resident also known as Skinny Suge. The first video was released in 2004 and a sequel followed in 2007; Baltimore police have called the DVDs a form of witness intimidation.

Suge is now serving a 19-year federal prison term. In an ironic twist of fate, his 14-year-old son, Najee Thomas, was murdered in April 2014, shot in the head as he sat inside his home in the Cherry Hill section of Baltimore. Police have not said whether Najee’s death was related to his father’s violent past, but blame the DVDs for a declining case-closure rate. They say the “Stop Snitching” videos have created an increasing unwillingness by members of the public to come forward with crime tips.

The police asked for the public’s help in solving Najee Thomas’ murder, but thus far no arrests have been made.

Perhaps a TV crime drama might not be the best setting for a discussion of the culture of snitching in our nation’s criminal justice system. A more appropriate venue might be a game show – for example, “Let’s Make a Deal.” ■

New York Judge Unseals Attica Prison Riot Records – Sort of

by Joe Watson

A NEW YORK STATE JUDGE HAS ORDERED the release of hundreds of pages of documents related to the investigation of the 1971 riot at the Attica Correctional Facility, but not before striking enough information from the records as to make them meaningless – despite pleas from state Attorney General Eric Schneiderman that it is time to give closures to families and victims of the uprising and its bloody aftermath.

The documents in question are volumes II and III of the Meyer Commission Report, which contain grand jury testimony related to the retaking of Attica by the New York State Police and prison guards. The commission was appointed by then-Governor Hugh Carey and headed by state court judge Bernard S. Meyer. Thirty-two prisoners and 11 guards were killed during the rebellion and scores were wounded, many critically.

The 570-page report, issued in 1975, concluded that while 62 prisoners had been indicted on various charges following the riot, a grand jury also should have considered charges against law enforcement officers. Only one state trooper was indicted by the grand jury – for reckless endangerment.

The commission stressed, however, that there were “important omissions” in evidence obtained by the New York State Police, as well as a potential conflict of interest in troopers investigating fellow officers who retook the prison. The commission faulted police for their takeover strategy and the resulting bloodshed, in which 29 prisoners and 10 guards being held hostage were fatally shot when officers stormed the facility.

After a full year of considering arguments on the issue, Erie County Supreme Court Judge Patrick H. NeMoyer ruled on April 24, 2014 that the Meyer Commission Report could be unsealed, but only after all names in the report were fully redacted and all evidence presented at the grand jury proceedings had been removed.

The decision essentially means that any information about who did the shooting when Attica was retaken on September 13, 1971, and anything learned from the grand jury’s investigation, will remain cloaked in secrecy. The retaking of the prison occurred after state officials refused to grant amnesty from criminal prosecution to prisoners who took part in the uprising.

The Meyer Commission Report was only produced after state prosecutor Malcolm Bell turned whistleblower in 1975 and alleged that not only had major crimes been committed by some state troopers and prison guards who retook the facility, but that in the aftermath, top state officials covered up abuses. Those abuses included police officers indiscriminately shooting prisoners, and savagely beating and torturing them.

NeMoyer’s ruling was an apparent victory for the New York State Police and the police union, which had both argued against releasing the remaining volumes of the Meyer Commission Report. Lavonne Williams, the widow of former State Police Col. Henry Williams, who had directed the assault to retake Attica upon the order of then-Governor Nelson Rockefeller, also objected to the release of the records.

When he finally agreed to petition the court to unseal the documents, Attorney General Schneiderman said the report would provide answers that have eluded victims and their families for the past 43 years.

“It is important, both for families directly affected and for future generations, that these historical documents be made available so the public can have a better understanding of what happened and how we can prevent future tragedies,” he said. “The time has come to bring transparency to one of New York State government’s darkest chapters.”

A group called the Forgotten Victims of Attica, made up of prison employees who survived the riot and families of those who died, had pushed the state for years to unseal the remaining volumes of the Meyer Commission Report.

“For families that lost their father, son, brother because they were killed in D Yard, they yearn to know the truth of how their loved one died and why they died,” said Gary Morton, an attorney representing the victims’ group. “Some of that has come out, but certainly there’s a lot more that hasn’t come out.”

In 1976, then-Governor Carey pardoned seven prisoners and exempted 20 troopers and prison guards – among the hundreds who seized control of Attica – from disciplinary action. He also commuted the death sentence of prisoner John Hill, who was convicted of beating Attica guard William “Billy” Quinn to death during the four-day riot.

In 2000, 25 years after the Meyer Commission Report was issued, the state reached a $12 million settlement with 502 former prisoners and families of those killed or injured who claimed they had been beaten, tortured and denied medical treatment after the riot. [See: PLN, June 2000, p.12]. Five years later, the state agreed to pay $12 million to settle claims filed by surviving prison employees and their family members. [See: PLN, Nov. 2005, p.33].

Some historians have termed the retaking of Attica “one of the bloodiest confrontations between the state and its citizenry in American history.” [See: PLN, Nov. 1997, p.19; Oct. 1996, p.12; Sept. 1991, p.1].

“With the exception of Indian massacres in the late 19th century, the State Police assault which ended the four-day prison uprising was the bloodiest one-day encounter between Americans since the Civil War,” wrote the New York State Special Commission on Attica.

dental decision, officials who manage the New York State Museum announced in May 2014 that they were removing from public view a cache of over 2,000 artifacts recovered following the riot so that family members, researchers and the general public would no longer be able to see them.

The items surfaced in 2012, discovered in a steel storage structure owned by New York State Police Troop A in Batavia, New York.

Among the objects that had been stored for four decades were personal letters to prisoners from their children, hundreds of photographs recovered by troopers from the cells of slain prisoners, notebooks containing stories of prison life at Attica and copies of prisoners' legal records.

There were also bloody clothes, including the shirt and pants belonging to prisoner spokesman Elliott L.D. Barkley, who some insist was executed after police retook the prison, as well as baseball bats recovered from the recreation yard. The artifacts also included items that belonged to guards who were killed during the riot, such as hats, badges and a wallet containing personal photos.

In making the announcement to close off access to these items, the museum said it would rely on "officials with the state corrections department and State Police to help inventory the artifacts." In other words, the agencies in charge of the bloodbath that resulted from storming the prison will now be responsible for deciding what the public can – and cannot – see.

Apparently, the saying "History is written by the victors," widely attributed to Winston Churchill, remains true.

The history of what caused the Attica rebellion, however, cannot be rewritten; the causes included overcrowding, poor conditions of confinement, racial tensions between the mostly black prisoners and all-white prison guards, and the refusal by prison officials to address those serious concerns. The Attica uprising occurred two weeks after the murder of political prisoner George Jackson by guards at the San Quentin State Prison in California. 📖

Selection and Retention Process for Tennessee Appellate Court Judges Challenged

by Christopher McWhorter

IN THE STATE OF TENNESSEE, JUDGES are elected. Before incumbent appellate court judges are placed on the ballot, however, they must be evaluated by the Judicial Performance Evaluation Committee (JPEC), which recommends whether they should be retained or replaced. "Retain" results in a retention election and a yes or no vote for the candidate, while "replace" means the candidate participates in a contested popular election. This process is part of the state's judicial selection and retention system known as the "Tennessee Plan."

State law requires the JPEC to be comprised of a cross-section of the population. The committee is composed of nine people – three judges, three attorneys and three non-attorneys – from different regions of the state. The JPEC members are also required to "approximate the population of the state with respect to race and gender," pursuant to T.C.A. § 17-4-201(b)(6).

According to a 2010 census, Tennessee's population is 52% female and 22.4% non-white; however, the JPEC includes only two women and one non-white member.

Well-known and relentless Nashville attorney John Jay Hooker, who has filed numerous challenges to the Tennessee Plan, sued Lt. Governor Ron Ramsey, House Speaker Beth Harwell and members of the JPEC in 2013 over the apparent statutory violations related to the JPEC's membership.

Hooker alleged that the composition of the JPEC violated state law because it was not representative of the female and minority population of the state. On January 15, 2014, Davidson County Circuit Court Judge Hamilton Gayden agreed.

"This Court concludes that the composition of the current Judicial Performance Evaluation Commission is invalid ab initio under Tenn. Code Ann. 17-4-201(b)(6) and is discriminatory against the female and black population of the State of Tennessee in violation of the Equal Protection and Due Process Clauses of both the United States and Tennessee Constitutions," he ruled.

Regardless, just two days after Judge Gayden's decision, the JPEC met to conduct business as usual. Ultimately, the commission issued recommendations to retain all 22 incumbent appellate court judges whose terms were ending, who were subsequently placed on the August 7, 2014 ballot.

The state appealed Judge Gayden's ruling and Hooker requested that the entire Tennessee Supreme Court recuse itself due to a conflict of interest, as Supreme Court justices are subject to the Tennessee Plan and the JPEC's retention recommendations. All but one justice agreed; Justice Janice Holder declined to recuse herself because she will be retiring. In June 2014, Governor Bill Haslam appointed a special Supreme Court panel to hear Hooker's appeal, and a decision in that case remains pending.

In a separate lawsuit filed by Hooker challenging the Tennessee Plan, including the way appellate court judges are initially selected by a nominating committee, a special Supreme Court panel ruled in March 2014 that the "retention election portion of the Tennessee Plan satisfies the constitutional requirement that the judges of the appellate courts be elected by the qualified voters of the State and does not violate the Tennessee Constitution." See: Hooker v. Haslam, 2014 Tenn. LEXIS 195 (Tenn. Mar. 17, 2014).

The legislature decided in April 2014 to hold a joint Judiciary Committee hearing on whether the JPEC was in violation of the state constitution by failing to meet diversity requirements, as argued by Hooker. According to the Tennessean, state Rep. Judd Matheny "warned that if the commission was found to be unlawfully seated, then the judicial appointments it made and the rulings of those judges could be called into question as 'fruits of the poisonous tree.'"

Then again, as the special Supreme Court panel noted in Hooker v. Haslam, even if the state's judicial selection process was invalidated, that would not automatically invalidate the acts of the judges who were improperly elected to office.

Meanwhile, the JPEC is no longer in existence as its statutory authority expired on June 30, 2014. A ballot measure to amend Tennessee's constitution to modify the state's selection and retention process for appellate court judges is on the November 2014 ballot. The measure retains much of the prior existing system, but would include increased participation – and influence – by the state legislature. ■

New Report Cites Fewer HIV-Positive State and Federal Prisoners

by Matt Clarke

A RECENT STUDY REVEALED THAT THE number of HIV-positive prisoners in both state and federal facilities nationwide is declining and, for the first time, the AIDS mortality rate for prisoners has fallen below the national average among the general population. The findings, presented in a Bureau of Justice Statistics report published by the U.S. Department of Justice, reflect a significant drop in the number of AIDS-related prisoner deaths.

The report, "HIV in Prisons, 2001-2010," documents a 10-year, 16 percent decline in the rate of HIV infections in state and federal prisons – from 194 per 10,000 prisoners at the end of 2001 to 146 per 10,000 at the end of 2010.

The reduction in AIDS-related deaths was even more dramatic, falling an average 16 percent per year among the states that reported such deaths during the same ten-year period. The study cited a drop in the rate of AIDS-related prisoner deaths from 24 per 100,000 population in 2001 to only five per 100,000 in 2010.

The steep decline means that in 2009, the AIDS mortality rate among state prisoners – six per 100,000 – fell below the rate in the general population – seven per 100,000 – for the first time.

The decrease is even more significant considering that at the end of 2001, the AIDS-related death rate among prisoners age 15 to 54 was about triple that of the general population.

"Rates of HIV/AIDS cases and AIDS-related deaths declined across all sizes of prison populations," the report stated. The reduction was greatest in large prisons (19 percent), followed by medium-sized prisons (17 percent) and small facilities (12 percent).

The study found that declines in AIDS-related deaths crossed both age and racial lines: "AIDS-related deaths in state prisons declined from 89 in 2009 to 69 in 2010 among males, from 70 to 43 among black non-Hispanics, and from 87 to 60 among all state inmates age 35 or older," the report noted.

New York led the list of states with the most HIV-positive prisoners, with 3,080 at the end of 2010. Florida was second with 2,920 and Texas third with 2,394. Combined, the three states held around 45% of the nation's HIV-positive state prisoners.

As of the end of 2010, just over 20,000 state and federal prisoners were reported to be HIV-positive, comprising 1.5 percent of the total prison population.

While the issue of HIV in the prison setting is improving in the U.S., it remains a serious problem in other countries – particularly those in Asia and Africa.

The United Nations' Office on Drugs and Crime recommends a "comprehensive strategy" to combat the problem of HIV among prisoners, addressing issues such as prison overcrowding, prisoner health care, staff awareness and training, and providing prisoners with "information, means of prevention, counseling and drug dependence treatment ... and rehabilitation opportunities," with special attention given to those at risk of infection, including "the mentally ill, juveniles, women, foreigners and those belonging to ethnic and other minorities."

The U.N. agency, which produced the "HIV in Prisons: Situation and Needs Assessment Toolkit," stresses that the overall objective should be "to ensure that every prisoner has access to essential HIV/AIDS prevention, treatment and care services."

BOP Criticized for Failing to Oversee Healthcare Administrator at FCC Butner

by Derek Gilna

THE FEDERAL BUREAU OF PRISONS (BOP) is facing criticism for its apparent failure to adequately oversee a Florida-based company responsible for coordinating the payment of BOP bills for prisoner medical care in North Carolina.

Before it went into receivership, MDI Holdings, Inc. of Ponte Verde Beach, Florida was a health care technology and analysis company that administered medical care for some 5,000 prisoners at the Federal Correctional Complex in Butner, North Carolina. The BOP's contract with MDI was the company's largest; the actual medical care at Butner was subcontracted to Duke University Health Center and a number of private practitioners.

MDI was successful for a number of years. Sales in 2009 reached $97 million, for example. But shortly thereafter the firm experienced a series of events that culminated in the expiration of its contract with the BOP in July 2012. When that contract was not renewed, the financial house of cards holding the company together collapsed.

The court-appointed receiver tasked with cleaning up the mess was Ronald Winters, a managing director with the Alvarez & Marsal Healthcare Industry Group in New York. The main challenge that Winters faced was repaying a $30 million loan that MDI had obtained from Wells Fargo & Company.

"We tried to make sure that nobody would become worse off than they were when we got here," Winters said. "In a difficult situation, we think we achieved a favorable outcome."

However, that "favorable outcome" did not include settling any debts incurred by MDI prior to Winters' appointment in September 2012. Those unpaid debts included amounts due to the Duke University Health System, which was owed about $8.3 million, and to various North Carolina doctors who performed medical services at FCC Butner, which includes the Federal Medical Center that houses prisoners who are elderly, ill or infirm.

Those health care professionals felt that the BOP should share responsibility for the millions of dollars still owed to them after MDI's collapse.

"Who provides services to the U.S. government and worries they're not going to get paid?" asked Douglas Holmes, owner of ENT and Audiology Associates in Raleigh, North Carolina, whose small office is owed almost $30,000 for prisoner medical care.

"Someone in the Bureau of Prisons surely knew [MDI officials] weren't doing things properly but they didn't tell us, and continued to send MDI payments" that should have gone directly to providers such as himself, he said.

Holmes' claims and others are under investigation by the North Carolina Medical Society. Society Associate General Counsel Conor Brackett said Freedom of Information Act requests have been filed with the BOP in an effort to determine the agency's responsibility for the unpaid medical bills.

"What we would like to understand a little more about what that oversight was like, meaning ... the Bureau of Prison's responsibilities and authority over MDI while the contract was in effect," Brackett said.

Another disgruntled provider, Carolina Vascular Surgery and Diagnostics, is owed nearly $50,000 by MDI, and also feels that the BOP bears some responsibility for the unpaid bills: "The government paid MDI to process claims and that's all ... they did, process and pay, so they should be [considered] government-backed."

Although the Duke University Health Center and other physicians are once again being paid for current medical services through a new company, Holmes is still not satisfied. "From what I've heard MDI did with the money, I'm wondering why the Department of Justice isn't getting involved and trying to put some of the [MDI] executives in Butner themselves."

MDI founder and former CEO Richard R. Willich, who claimed to be a Vietnam veteran, former Marine Corps reserve officer and law school graduate, was known for a lavish lifestyle that included a working farm and a $120,000 electric car, paid for with funds loaned to MDI by Wells Fargo, according to allegations in the bank's lawsuit against the company. The Business Journal reported that $1 million worth of artwork and artifacts had been displayed at the firm's headquarters. Wells Fargo confiscated and sold the artwork, along with furniture and other items in the building, to help satisfy MDI's debt.

MDI also fell prey to a former employee who stole some of its intellectual property rights, which were then used by other companies to undermine the firm. MDI sued John Long-Field Smith and obtained a $2 million judgment plus attorneys' fees and costs in December 2011, but by then it was too little, too late.

"There was a substantial amount of business damage done to MDI Holdings," stated attorney Mike Freed, who represented the company. He estimated losses in MDI's finances and reputation at greater than $10 million, though he noted the exact amount was difficult to calculate.

MDI and Wells Fargo had been negotiating a restructuring of the $30 million loan until March 2012, when the bank demanded full repayment. MDI countered by filing suit because, according to the company's attorney, Geoffrey Heekin, "They weren't ready to surrender just yet."

When the BOP did not renew its contract with MDI for administering healthcare at FCC Butner, the company realized the end was near. It dropped the suit against Wells Fargo and agreed to receivership and liquidation. The liquidation was finalized in early 2013, and the corporation's office building went into foreclosure.

"They made that decision based on the economics of it," said Heekin. "They realized there wasn't much hope." ■

South Florida Landlord Bucks Trend, Offers Housing to Sex Offenders

LAWS THAT RESTRICT WHERE SEX OFFENDERS can live when they are released from prison leave many homeless, but one south Florida apartment manager is providing housing opportunities by leasing apartments to offenders on liberal terms.

"I just believe that everybody deserves a second chance," said Pamela Eaton, the manager of Fairfield Apartments in south Fort Myers. She indicated her goal is to help sex offenders become independent and productive citizens, "because everybody makes mistakes." She considers post-release housing one step in that direction.

Restrictive ordinances such as those in Miami-Dade County have made the area virtually off limits to sex offenders, which in the past forced some to live under the Julia Tuttle Causeway bridge. [See: PLN, March 2011, p.13; Dec. 2009, p.14; July 2009, p.36; June 2008, p.1].

Residency restrictions in Lee County, which are the same as under Florida state law, prohibit sex offenders convicted of crimes involving minors from living within 1,000 feet of schools, playgrounds, parks or other places where children congregate – leaving few housing options available. Further, many landlords are reluctant to rent to sex offenders, and because they have trouble finding jobs, some are unable to pay rent.

"Other than a small area in Lehigh Acres where there are large, desolate areas that are not within 1,000 feet of where children congregate, which is in the eastern part of the county and away from most jobs, the only option is [Fairfield Apartments] or the woods," said Pam Donelson with the Florida Department of Corrections. "There are a few other very small pockets of desolate residential areas that comply, but they are few and far between."

Pamela Eaton recruits in prisons throughout Florida by offering housing for sex offenders. She often waives the $200 security deposit for those just released from prison and allows them to owe her the first month's $450 rent. Most sleep three-to-four in an apartment, sharing a common kitchen and bathroom. Each renter has his own room furnished with a twin bed, TV, dresser and night stand.

Eaton's rental policy has generated hostility from her neighbors, though that doesn't sway her. Fairfield Apartments is located in a quiet neighborhood where children play and ride bicycles. One resident, Julie Evans, was not afraid to express how she feels about living next to registered sex offenders.

"I got a gun," she said. "And I will use that gun."

But for former prisoners like Clyde Lother, who served 17 years for lewd and indecent assault against a child, Fairfield Apartments saves them from homelessness and possible rearrest for failing to have a permanent address. "I wrote letters [from prison] to places telling them I have no money, I have no income," Luther said. "I wrote letter after letter after letter, place after place after place." He said Eaton was the only one who responded.

She screens potential sex offender tenants to ensure they are non-violent and sincere about changing their lives. Sex offenders, Eaton said, are some of her best renters. "They're really wanting to do right," she stated. "They really are."

In mid-September 2012, there were 22 registered sex offenders housed at the Fairfield Apartments complex and a dozen in surrounding homes.

Some were forced to move, however, when one of the five buildings in the complex was sold to a Canadian couple; the new owners immediately canceled the month-to-month leases of five sex offender tenants.

"We have no place to go," said Steve Bills, one of the renters forced to move. "I mean, this is the only place."

Those who were displaced found housing in the four remaining buildings that Eaton still manages. "I'm here for them," she said. "I'm not just going to let them go without." However, she has only so much space for sex offenders, forcing her to turn away as many as 10 hopeful applicants each week.

As of July 2014, the Florida sex offender registry listed 18 sex offenders living at Fairfield Apartments. There are over 23,000 registered sex offenders in the state. ■

Massachusetts: Acquittal on Additional Sex Offense Doesn't Trigger Reevaluation of Sex Offender Classification

by Matt Clarke

ON SEPTEMBER 11, 2013, THE MASSACHUSETTS Supreme Court held that a prisoner who had been convicted of a sex offense, then given a level three classification by the Sex Offender Registry Board (SORB) due to a more serious pending sex charge, was not automatically entitled to be reclassified following his acquittal on the latter charge.

John Soe, a registered sex offender in Massachusetts, was charged with multiple counts of raping, attempting to rape and committing indecent assault and battery on his 11-year-old stepdaughter. While on bail awaiting trial on those charges, he pleaded guilty to sexually touching the 16-year-old daughter of a friend and was placed on probation.

Following that conviction, the SORB notified Soe of its preliminary decision to classify him as a level three sex offender – the most dangerous type of offender with the highest risk of reoffending. He requested an administrative review and asked the review to be stayed until the more serious charges involving his stepdaughter were resolved.

The SORB denied the request, considering a previous interview with his stepdaughter and conducted a hearing. Soe's attorney told the board that Soe's lawyer in the criminal case was preserving his Fifth Amendment rights; therefore, he could not testify or present evidence. The hearing examiner found that Soe was a high-risk sex offender and classified him under a level three registration.

The Superior Court affirmed the SORB's decision, and Soe appealed.

The Massachusetts Supreme Court noted that a sex offender facing a SORB hearing before a trial has taken place on one of the offenses being considered in the hearing has a “difficult” and “strategic” dilemma when choosing between preserving his Fifth Amendment rights and trying to reduce his sex offender classification level, but that alone does not constitute a denial of due process. The board has a public safety interest in obtaining a prompt classification which it has to weigh against an offender’s

Fifth Amendment rights, and pending charges do not provide an automatic right to a stay of the hearing.

Soe also was not entitled to automatic reclassification after he was acquitted on the charges involving his stepdaughter, as he could have been acquitted yet still have committed the crimes. “[W]e also recognize that an acquittal on such charges demonstrates only that the Commonwealth failed to prove the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, and is insufficient alone to show that the allegations were false or baseless,” the Supreme Court held.

The board may, on its own or the sex offender’s motion, reconsider a classification; however, Soe had not yet made such a motion. Therefore, the judgment of the Superior Court upholding Soe’s level three sex offender classification was affirmed. See: Soe v. Sex Offender Registry Board, 466 Mass. 381, 995 N.E.2d 73 (Mass. 2013). ■

Fifth Circuit: Prisoner Who was Raped May Proceed with Lawsuit against Lock Company

by Matt Clarke

IN A JULY 9, 2013 OPINION, THE FIFTH Circuit Court of Appeals held that the statute of limitations in a federal lawsuit against a manufacturer of cell door locks at a county jail, brought by a former prisoner who was allegedly raped at the facility when he was nineteen years old, did not start to run until he turned twenty-one.

On August 2, 2007, while incarcerated at Mississippi’s Harrison County Adult Detention Center, Aaron Wayne Page, then 19, claimed he was raped by another prisoner who was able to leave his own cell and enter Page’s cell due to faulty door locks. In February 2009, Page filed a lawsuit in federal court. Two years later he amended the complaint to include RR Brink Locking Systems, Inc., the manufacturer of the cell door locks, alleging that the faulty locks made Brink liable for negligence, strict liability and breach of warranty.

Brink filed a motion for summary judgment on the grounds that Mississippi’s three-year statute of limitations period for personal injury and products liability claims, which controlled in this case, had run before the lawsuit was amended. Although state law provides that the statute of limitations for suits brought by persons under the age of twenty-one at the time of the allegedly tortious incident does not begin to run until the plaintiff turns twenty-one, Brink argued that Page was an emancipated minor because he had been arrested and charged as an adult sixteen times before he turned twenty-one.

The district court denied the motion, holding that being emancipated was distinct and different from the statutory provision related to removing the disability of infancy (i.e., being underage). Brink then filed an interlocutory appeal.

The Fifth Circuit held that Miss. Code Ann. § 15-1-59 provides that the statute of limitations shall not begin until the disability of infancy is removed. Emancipation, as set forth in Miss. Code Ann. § 93-1-65(8)(a), relieves parents of the obligations of parental support, but does not remove the disability of infancy. The disability of infancy may be removed by decree of a chancery court pursuant to Miss. Ann. Code § 93-19-09, but only with respect to specific transactions related to property, making contracts or entering into a profession or avocation. There is no indication in Mississippi common law that emancipation works as a general removal of the disability of infancy. As state law distinguishes between the two, the statute of limitations did not begin to run until Page turned twenty-one; the judgment of the district court was therefore affirmed. See: Baker v. RR Brink Locking Systems, Inc., 721 F.3d 716 (5th Cir. 2013).

Following remand, the claims against Brink settled in March 2014. The trial court granted in part and denied in part Harrison County’s motion for summary judgment on August 11, 2014, and the county settled 10 days later. See: Baker v. Harrison County, U.S.D.C. (S.D. Miss.), Case No. 1:09-cv-00146-LG-JCG. ■

Eleventh Circuit Tailors Turner for Censorship Claims at Civil Commitment Center

by David M. Reutter

ON SEPTEMBER 23, 2013, THE ELEVENTH Circuit Court of Appeals vacated a summary judgment order that upheld a civil commitment center's policy which limited circulation of a detainee's controversial newsletter among residents at the facility. The appellate ruling also altered the Turner standard to strike a balance to reflect differences between civil detention and criminal incarceration.

James R. Pesci is a civil detainee at the Florida Civil Commitment Center (FCCC), which has over 600 residents and is operated under contract by the GEO Group. For some years, Pesci had published a newsletter called "Duck Soup" that was highly critical of the FCCC, its policies and its employees.

To limit circulation of the publication, FCCC director Timothy Budz promulgated a policy in April 2009 that barred all residents from printing or copying Duck Soup. The rationale was that the newsletter disrupted order and discipline at the facility, and had a powerful adverse effect on the FCCC's ability to rehabilitate civil detainees.

In one issue, Pesci described the Florida Department of Children and Families and its contractor, GEO Group, as a "white collared, criminal enterprise." He encouraged residents to hold "collective protests" and "demonstrations," saying they were "cowards" for not doing so. He also made personal attacks on named staff members.

Shortly after Pesci filed his civil rights action, Budz adopted a second, stricter policy in 2010 that characterized Duck Soup as "contraband." In February 2012, the district court granted summary judgment to Budz, holding the 2009 policy was constitutional without addressing the more restrictive 2010 policy.

On appeal, the Eleventh Circuit found the 2010 policy supplanted in every respect the 2009 policy. Due to a number of factors, the Court of Appeals concluded both policies should be considered simultaneously and vacated the district court's summary judgment order.

A central issue was the appropriate legal standard to be used in adjudicating Pesci's First Amendment claims. The appellate court held that "[a]pplication of the Turner [v. Safely, 482 U.S. 78 (1987)] standard in the civil detention context must be tailored to reflect that the range of legitimate governmental interests is narrower here than it is in the prison context."

"In short, while there may be shared governmental interests surrounding civil and criminal detention, they are not coextensive," the Eleventh Circuit wrote. "Thus, in the context of this case, the government may not justify a limitation on expressive freedoms based on retribution or general deterrence," or on "punitive conditions of confinement."

The Court of Appeals held that a rational relation standard, consistent with the limitations set forth in its ruling, was the appropriate standard against which to measure Pesci's First Amendment claims as a civil detainee. The case was remanded for further proceedings and remains pending before the district court. See: Pesci v. Budz, 730 F.3d 1291 (11th Cir. 2013). ■

Transferred Prisoner May Sue Oklahoma Officials in Oregon Court

by Mark Wilson

IN AN OCTOBER 9, 2013 RULING, THE Oregon Court of Appeals held that Oregon courts have personal jurisdiction over Oklahoma prison officials with respect to claims brought by an Oregon prisoner transferred to Oklahoma.

In May 2007, Oregon prison officials transferred Liam O'Neil, aka Jacob Barrett, to the Oklahoma State Penitentiary (OSP) under the Interstate Corrections Compact. Soon thereafter, Barrett sent several letters and grievances to OSP Warden Marty Sirmons concerning his treatment and living conditions at the facility.

Oregon attorney Charles Simmons represented Barrett in several legal actions and regularly communicated with him by letter and telephone while he was confined at OSP.

In August 2008, Simmons sent Barrett legal mail containing attorney-client privileged materials. OSP Case Manager Estes intercepted and read the mail, stating, "This doesn't look legal. I'm confiscating it."

Barrett asked Estes and Sirmons to deliver his legal mail and explain why it had been confiscated. When they did not respond, he filed a grievance.

Simmons had previously verified to Oregon prison officials that he was a licensed attorney who represented Barrett. Nevertheless, Sirmons directed Simmons to explain how the materials he had sent Barrett were legal mail; provide proof, such as an employment contract, that he was Barrett's attorney; and prove that he was licensed to practice law in Oklahoma. Simmons responded with a 10-page letter and 29 pages of attachments. Barrett was never given or shown the legal mail, however, because Warden Sirmons determined that Simmons had not adequately explained how it constituted legal materials.

Barrett challenged the opening of legal mail outside his presence by Oklahoma prison officials by filing a state habeas petition in Oregon. That case was dismissed, and the dismissal was affirmed on appeal. See: Barrett v. Williams, 247 Ore. App 309, 270 P.3d 285 (Or. Ct. App. 2011), review denied.

OSP prisoners began threatening Barrett after a guard told several United Aryan Brotherhood (UAB) prisoners that Barrett was a "rat" who was transferred to OSP because he was providing information against "White boys" at an Oregon prison. Guards allegedly plotted with UAB members to have Barrett killed by opening his cell so other prisoners could attack him.

After receiving threatening notes from a UAB prisoner named "Fester," Barrett contacted Oregon prison officials claiming that his life was in danger. He sent copies of the threatening notes, offered to identify staff members, prisoners and others who could confirm the UAB activities, and requested a transfer.

Oklahoma internal affairs investigators questioned Barrett and OSP officials, but did not interview any other prisoners. Oregon prison officials did not investigate the threats.

Barrett was then assaulted by a UAB member and again requested a transfer; Simmons asked Oregon prison officials to place Barrett in protective custody. Oklahoma prison officials refused to move Barrett or take any other action.

Barrett filed suit in Oregon state court against more than three dozen Oregon and Oklahoma prison officials. He alleged § 1983 claims of retaliation, interference with his legal mail and attorney-client relationship, failure to protect him from known threats and negligence claims under Oregon state law. Barrett sought damages and declaratory and injunctive relief, plus attorney's fees.

After Barrett filed suit, he was transferred to a New Mexico prison. Oklahoma and Oregon officials moved to dismiss the lawsuit for failure to state a claim and lack of personal jurisdiction over the Oklahoma officials. The trial court granted the motions and refused to grant Barrett leave to amend his complaint.

The Oregon Court of Appeals reversed. Noting that Barrett did not challenge the dismissal of any Oklahoma officials except Sirmons and Estes, the appellate court found in a detailed ruling that their interference with Barrett's legal mail was sufficient to bring them within the personal jurisdiction of Oregon courts. The Court of Appeals also concluded that the trial court had improperly refused "to allow plaintiff his right to file an amended complaint." Finally, although Barrett had been transferred to New Mexico, his claims were not moot because he had requested monetary damages in addition to injunctive and declaratory relief. See: O'Neil v. Martin, 258 Ore. App. 819, 312 P.3d 538 (Or. Ct. App. 2013), review denied. ■

Former New Mexico State Senator Released from Prison

MANNY ARAGON, 66, A FORMER NEW Mexico state Senate leader, was released from federal prison on December 5, 2013. Although most federal prisoners are sent to a halfway house to complete the remainder of their sentence, Aragon was released to home confinement at his house in Albuquerque.

"He's still subject to our rules and regulations and accountability monitoring," said Bureau of Prisons spokesman Chris Burke.

Aragon served three decades in the state legislature, rising to the position of Senate President Pro Tem, and was one of New Mexico's most powerful Democrats. However, his lengthy political career was eclipsed by the sordid details of his downfall: A scandal that involved skimming $4.4 million from a project to build the Bernalillo County Metropolitan Courthouse. Aragon, who admitted taking $600,000 from the courthouse project, was one of several defendants prosecuted in the scandal.

He pleaded guilty to federal conspiracy and fraud charges in 2008 and was sentenced to 67 months in prison, plus a $750,000 fine and $649,000 in restitution. He served around 4½ years before being released.

Aragon was also known for flip-flopping on the issue of prison privatization. Initially opposed to private prisons, he changed his mind after being hired as a consultant by Wackenhut Corrections (now the GEO Group) in 1998, while still serving in the state Senate. He later withdrew from his consulting job with Wackenhut after facing criticism for having a conflict of interest. [See: PLN, Aug. 2007, p.13; Dec. 1999, p.1].

In spite of his conviction, Aragon continues to receive his state pension of almost $2,300 per month, and reportedly used those funds to make restitution payments while incarcerated. New Mexico passed a law in 2012 that allows revocation of state pensions when public officials are convicted of felonies, but the law was not made retroactive. ■

Eighth Circuit Upholds Injunction Over Cameras in Restrooms at Civil Commitment Center

by Matt Clarke

IN APRIL 2013 THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT Court of Appeals upheld a preliminary injunction granted by a federal district court in a lawsuit challenging the placement of video cameras in bathrooms at the Iowa Civil Commitment Unit for Sex Offenders, a secure facility.

John W. Arnzen III, Harold Williams, Galen K. Shaffer and Edward Lee Briggs, patients at the Civil Commitment Unit, filed a civil rights action pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983, alleging that installing cameras in the restrooms at the Unit violated the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable searches and their right to privacy. They then sought a preliminary injunction.

The district court denied the injunction with respect to multi-user bathrooms (those with multiple toilets, showers and sinks), and granted it with respect to single-user restrooms (those with a single toilet, shower and sink). The defendants appealed.

On appeal, administrators at the Civil Commitment Unit argued that the cameras were installed after a reported sexual assault and an incident in which a patient with a serious communicable disease engaged in consensual sex without informing the other patient of his disease. Although the cameras are not monitored and the video recordings are destroyed within two to three weeks unless they are being used in an investigation, the administrators claimed the cameras prevented assaults and other illicit behavior, and argued the district court should have deferred to their judgment as qualified professionals.

Reviewing the grant of the preliminary injunction under an abuse of discretion standard, the Eighth Circuit held the plaintiffs had the same Fourth Amendment rights as pretrial detainees. The appellate court noted that the patients had expressed more than just a general discomfort and embarrassment; they were victims of childhood sexual abuse, and "persuasively report[ed] significant ongoing trauma and distress related to the placement of cameras in their bathrooms, which they, in sometimes eloquent and disturbing detail, equate with their previous experiences of victimization."

The Court of Appeals wrote that while the unmonitored cameras might help deter illicit behavior and assist in investigations, they "do not provide immediate alerts concerning patient safety or directly prevent assaults or dangerous acts." Even the defendants acknowledged that providing restroom doors that lock from the inside could significantly reduce the risk of assaults. Also, since the entrances to the bathrooms are actively monitored via video cameras, staff could immediately investigate when more than one person enters a single-user restroom. Thus, the cameras are not the only way – and may not be the most effective way – to prevent assaults and illicit sexual activity in restroom areas.

The Eighth Circuit found "that in the circumstances of this case there is a greater public interest in protecting the Fourth Amendment rights of the patients and their 'personal privacy and dignity against unwarranted intrusion by the State,'" and therefore affirmed the district court's preliminary injunction order. See: Arnzen v. Palmer, 713 F.3d 369 (8th Cir. 2013).

The case settled following remand, with the defendants agreeing to remove the video cameras in restrooms at the Civil Commitment Unit and to ensure that cameras in the hallways outside bathrooms "do not show patients in the shower or on the toilet." Further, the defendants agreed to pay $22,000 in attorney's fees and to give $100 in commissary or shopping account credit to each of the four plaintiffs. See: Arnzen v. Palmer, U.S.D.C. (N.D. Iowa), Case No. 5:12-cv-04001-DEO. ■

First Circuit Dismisses Appeal of Court's Failure to Sanction Federal Prosecutor

by Matt Clarke

ON JULY 22, 2013, THE FIRST CIRCUIT Court of Appeals dismissed an appeal by the Massachusetts Bar Counsel challenging the failure of a district court and a three-judge disciplinary panel to discipline an Assistant U.S. Attorney who allegedly withheld exculpatory evidence in a federal criminal case.

Jeffrey Auerhahn was a U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) special attorney for the investigation and prosecution of Boston's Patriarca crime family in the New England Strike Force's Organized Crime and Racketeering Section. He worked closely with Boston police detective Martin Coleman.

In investigating the 1985 murder of Vincent Limoli, who worked for Patriarca soldier Vincent Ferrara, the Strike Force was able to develop an informant named Walter Jordan, who, along with Pasquale Barone, was seen with Limoli shortly before he was killed. In exchange for almost complete immunity and being allowed into the witness protection program, Jordan told Coleman and Auerhahn that Ferrara had ordered the hit on Limoli, Jordan had helped set up the hit and Barone had "whacked" Limoli.

Connecting Ferrara to the Limoli hit was crucial in prosecuting him on organized crime charges. Without evidence that Ferrara had ordered the hit on Limoli to move up in the Patriarca crime family, the RICO prosecution would have been compromised.

While waiting to testify in the trials of Ferrara and Barone, Jordan met with Detective Coleman and informed him that after the murder, Barone told him Ferrara had not given him permission to kill Limoli, and they had to flee Boston because Ferrara wanted to kill them both for murdering Limoli without authorization. Jordan admitted having withheld this information, and Coleman memorialized Jordan's admission in a handwritten memo.

Coleman then met privately with Auerhahn and was very upset about Jordan's potential testimony, which threatened to derail the prosecution. Auerhahn claimed he did not ask about the details of what was wrong because Coleman was so upset that Auerhahn thought he might have a heart attack.

Coleman then initiated a phone call between him, Auerhahn and Jordan to talk about Jordan's testimony, and Jordan again stated that Barone said Ferrara had not given him permission to kill Limoli. Auerhahn later prepared a "significantly toned-down version" of Coleman's memo that was less damaging to the prosecution's case (the "Auerhahn memo"). At a subsequent meeting with Auerhahn present, after being pressured Jordan once again stated that Barone had denied Ferrara had given him permission, but said Barone had then immediately passed it off as a joke.

After Ferrara pleaded guilty, Auerhahn revealed Jordan's statements in a separate, related prosecution. Meanwhile, Barone was convicted and sentenced to life plus 20 years. Jordan contacted the Strike Force in 2002, claiming that he had been intimidated into giving false testimony against Ferrara and Barone. They both eventually received habeas corpus relief and were released from prison; Barone had served 10 years while Ferrara had served 13.

In affirming the district court's grant of habeas relief, the First Circuit stated, in Ferrara's case, that "...we are dealing with more than simple neglect to turn over exculpatory evidence; the government manipulated the witness (Jordan) into reverting back to his original version of events, then effectively represented to the court and the defense that the witness was going to confirm the story (now known by the prosecution to be a manipulated tale) that [Ferrara] was responsible for killing Limoli."

The appellate court also noted that "[a]t the evidentiary hearing, Auerhahn claimed never to have seen the Auerhahn memo. The District Court rejected this self-serving disclaimer, finding explicitly 'that Auerhahn not only saw the document, he prepared it.'" See: Ferrara v. United States, 456 F.3d 278 (1st Cir. 2006).

The DOJ launched an investigation into the botched prosecution, and the DOJ's Office of Professional Responsibility released a 112-page report in 2005 that found Auerhahn had acted in reckless disregard to discovery obligations and failed to comply with a court order to produce all of his notes of his meetings with Jordan. The U.S. Attorney issued a letter of reprimand.

Finding that a reprimand was inadequate, in 2007 the district court asked the state Bar Counsel to initiate disciplinary action against Auerhahn. Bar Counsel determined that Auerhahn had violated several state bar disciplinary rules and recommended that he be disciplined. The court appointed a three-judge panel to determine an appropriate sanction; however, the panel found that Bar Counsel had "failed to prove by clear and convincing evidence that Auerhahn ever learned of [Jordan's] statement, if it was made at all."

Bar Counsel appealed the decision, but the First Circuit determined there was no standing for the appeal, as Bar Counsel "was not a party to Auerhahn's disciplinary proceedings and thus may not appeal the Panel's decision." Consequently, the appeal was dismissed for lack of jurisdiction. See: In re Auerhahn, 724 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 2013).

Auerhahn remains employed with the U.S. Attorney's office in Boston. ■

Alabama Work Release Transportation, Medical and Drug Screen Costs Not “Incidental to Confinement”

by David M. Reutter

ALABAMA'S SUPREME COURT HAS HELD that the plain language of § 14-8-6, Ala. Code 1975 does not prohibit the Alabama Department of Corrections (ADOC) from collecting, over and above the 40% threshold established by that law, costs that are not incidental to a prisoner's confinement – including transportation costs and fees stemming from participation in the prison system's optional work-release program.

The December 6, 2013 ruling came in a class-action lawsuit that challenged the ADOC's deduction of more than 40% of prisoners' gross earnings for costs associated with transportation to employment, laundering work clothes, drug-testing fees and prisoner-initiated medical visits. [See: PLN, May 2008, p.38; July 2006, p.35]. Pursuant to § 14-8-6, Ala. Code 1975, the ADOC is authorized “to withhold up to 40% of an inmate's work-release earnings for costs ‘incident to the inmate's confinement.’”

The ADOC contended that it could make deductions for costs associated with those services beyond the 40% statutory threshold because they were not “incident to” a prisoner's incarceration. The plaintiffs in the class-action suit argued such costs were incidental, and thus not subject to additional withholdings.

The Alabama Supreme Court agreed with the ADOC, as the prisoners offered nothing to show that the ADOC's definition of incidental costs differed from the statutory language. ADOC Commissioner Kim Thomas testified that costs of confinement include “Electricity, gas, water, repairs on the buildings, salaries of employees and benefits, food, processing food, transporting food, gas, paper products, health care, mental health care.”

Transportation fees for work release are “not related to the confinement itself,” he stated, but are fees that “relate[] directly to [the inmate's] ... employment.” The Supreme Court agreed, finding work release transportation costs are related to the prisoner's “decision to participate in a voluntary program offered by” the ADOC.

Fees for drug tests, which cost $31.50, are charged only if the prisoner tests positive for illegal drug use on a prison-administered drug screening and the positive result is subsequently confirmed by “a free-world laboratory.” The $3.00 medical co-pay for self-initiated prisoner medical visits is determined by medical staff, and intended to discourage “malinger[ing].”

The Supreme Court found the fees related to tests for illegal drug use and “purportedly unnecessary medical care” do not arise from a prisoner's confinement, but “from a voluntary and unnecessary undertaking by the inmate.”

The Court concluded that the ADOC's “interpretation of § 14-8-6 as permitting its collection of charges, which are not incident to the inmate's confinement, in excess of the 40% withholding cap established by that statute is both reasonable and consistent with the statutory language.” Accordingly, the lower court's order that held the ADOC was limited to deducting 40% of a prisoner's gross wages was reversed and remanded. Justice Glenn Murdock issued a dissenting opinion. See: Thomas v. Merritt, 2013 Ala. LEXIS 172 (Ala. Dec. 6, 2013). ■

Seventh Circuit Upholds Dismissal of Suit Over Placement on Suicide Watch

by Matt Clarke

THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT COURT OF Appeals has affirmed the dismissal of a prisoner's lawsuit over his placement on suicide watch and in administrative segregation.

Daryise L. Earl, a Wisconsin prisoner, filed a civil rights action pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 alleging that officials at the Racine County Jail were deliberately indifferent to his medical needs and violated his due process rights when they placed him on suicide watch following his conviction for first-degree intentional homicide, and required him to wear suicide-proof clothes to which he was allergic. Earl was on suicide watch for five days, then placed in administrative segregation for twelve days. During a later return to the jail for a hearing, he was again held in ad seg for seven days.

Jail officials claimed they had a policy requiring the placement of prisoners on suicide watch after conviction of a serious felony, until a mental health examination cleared them for general population. Earl alleged the suicide watch and stints in administrative segregation were in retaliation for false accusations that he had threatened guards at the jail.

Upon granting the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the district court held that neither the placement on suicide watch or in ad seg was “unusually harsh,” nor long enough to implicate a liberty interest. Therefore, no due process claim could be raised. Further, because the jail guards summoned a nurse when Earl reported having an allergic reaction to the suicide-proof clothing and the nurse gave him medication and a cream despite not finding a rash, there was no evidence of deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs.

Earl appealed, arguing that the reason for his placement on suicide watch was a triable issue of fact. The Seventh Circuit held the reason he was on suicide watch or whether other, similarly situated prisoners were not placed on suicide watch did not matter. Because the suicide watch was of insufficient duration and lacked harsh conditions, it failed to implicate a liberty interest – which prevented Earl from raising a due process claim. The same reasoning applied to Earl's placement in ad seg: “his time in segregation was too short to affect his liberty, and he did not point to any conditions of administrative segregation that were any worse than general prison conditions.”

Earl also had no viable claim for deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs because the guards summoned a nurse, the nurse provided treatment and the guards followed the nurse's medical decision that he could continue wearing the suicide watch clothes. The judgment of the district court was therefore affirmed. See: Earl v. Racine County Jail, 718 F.3d 689 (7th Cir. 2013). ■

Eighth Circuit Holds No SORNA Registration Requirement after Leaving U.S.

by Matt Clarke

THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT COURT OF Appeals held in August 2013 that the Sex Offender Registration and Notification Act (SORNA) does not require a registered sex offender (RSO) who moves to a foreign country to notify the state of his change of address.

Robert D. Lunsford, a Missouri RSO, flew to the Philippines on a three-week round-trip ticket in 2011. He did not return to the United States or inform the Missouri sex offender registry of his change of address. He was arrested in the Philippines two months later and eventually deported to the U.S., where he was charged with failure to update his registration in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2250(a).

Lunsford moved to dismiss the indictment on the grounds that SORNA did not require him to update his registration once he left the country; his motion was denied and he entered a conditional guilty plea. He then appealed the denial of the motion.

The Eighth Circuit observed that SORNA requires RSOs to keep their residency information current in each jurisdiction where they reside, are employed or are a student. An RSO who travels in interstate or foreign commerce without updating a registry as required by SORNA is in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2250(a). Further, 42 U.S.C. § 16913(a) requires an RSO who changes his or her address to appear in person in at least one of the jurisdictions involved and inform them of the changes in registry information within three days of the move. However, the definition of “jurisdiction involved” in 42 U.S.C. § 16911(10) excludes foreign countries.

The government did not argue that Lunsford was a resident, student or employed in Missouri when he allegedly violated SORNA, which the plea agreement specified was “after he traveled in interstate and foreign commerce.” Therefore, “after Lunsford left the country, Missouri was not the location of his home or a place where he habitually lives, so Lunsford did not ‘reside’ in Missouri when he changed his residence.”

Although the National Guidelines for Sex Offender Registration and Notification provide that an RSO who leaves the country must inform the jurisdiction in which he has been registered, under 73 Fed. Reg. 38,030, 38,066-67 (July 2, 2008), the guidelines do not address the language of the statute which requires an RSO to keep the registry current where he or she “resides,” not “resided.”

Therefore, and disagreeing with the Tenth Circuit insofar as it may have held otherwise in United States v. Murphy, 664

F.3d 798 (10th Cir. 2011) [PLN, Aug. 2012, p.30], the Eighth Circuit held that an RSO who travels to another country and resides there does not violate SORNA by failing to update the registry of the jurisdiction where he previously lived.

The judgment of the district court was reversed and the case remanded with instructions to dismiss the indictment. See: United States v. Lunsford, 725 F.3d 859 (8th Cir. 2013). ■

Fourth Circuit Finds PLRA Attorney Fee Cap Constitutional

by David M. Reutter

THE FOURTH CIRCUIT COURT OF Appeals held on November 1, 2013 that the attorney fee provision of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) is constitutional. The ruling was in alignment with other appellate courts that have considered the issue.

North Carolina state prisoner Jamey Lamont Wilkins filed a federal civil rights complaint in 2008, alleging that a guard at the Lanesboro Correctional Institute had “maliciously and sadistically” assaulted him with “excessive force” in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court dismissed the lawsuit for failure to state a claim because Wilkins had alleged no more than de minimis injury.

The Fourth Circuit affirmed that ruling in Wilkins v. Gaddy, 308 Fed.Appx. 696 (4th Cir. 2009). The Supreme Court, however, granted certiorari and reversed, holding the “core judicial inquiry” in Eighth Amendment claims is not focused on the “extent of the injury” sustained but rather on the “nature of the force” used. See: Wilkins v. Gaddy, 559 U.S. 34 (2010) [PLN, Dec. 2010, p.49].

Following remand, Wilkins obtained representation from North Carolina Prisoner Legal Services and proceeded to trial. The jury found the guard, Alexander Gaddy, liable for assault, but declined to award compensatory or punitive damages. Instead, the jurors awarded nominal damages of $.99 and the district court rounded up to enter judgment for $1.00.

As the prevailing party, Wilkins filed a motion for $92,306.25 in attorney fees under the fee-shifting provisions of 42 U.S.C. § 1988. The district court awarded fees in the amount of $1.40 and rejected Wilkins’ argument that the PLRA’s cap on attorney fees, 42 U.S.C. § 1997e(d)(2), is unconstitutional because it “irrationally treat[s] prisoner and non-prisoner litigants differently.”

The challenged provision of the PLRA limits attorney fee awards that a successful prisoner litigant may recover in a civil rights action to a maximum of 150% of the monetary judgment. There is no similar limitation for non-incarcerated plaintiffs.

On appeal, the Fourth Circuit noted that with the Civil Rights Attorney Fees Award Act of 1976, codified at 42 U.S.C. 1988, Congress abrogated the “American Rule” which requires that a litigant typically must pay the costs of his or her own attorney. “But what Congress provides, Congress can adjust or take away,” the appellate court wrote.

In an effort to reduce the “ever-growing number of prison-condition lawsuits that were threatening to overwhelm the capacity of the federal judiciary,” Congress enacted the Prison Litigation Reform Act, which was signed into law by President Clinton in 1996. The Court of Appeals held that while § 1997e(d)(2) may not be the only or optimal way of stemming baseless prisoner lawsuits, Congress had acted rationally in adopting that provision of the PLRA.

The cap on attorney fee awards requires lawyers to carefully weigh the merits of prison-related lawsuits, and requires greater odds of success in such cases. This, Congress could have rationally concluded, would prevent the filing of at least some ultimately meritless claims.

Congress was also free to conclude that attorney fee awards such as the one sought in this case are so disproportionate to a monetary judgment that they are an unwise use of public funds. Based upon these rationales, the district court's order awarding $1.40 in attorney fees was affirmed. See: Wilkins v. Gaddy, 734 F.3d 344 (4th Cir. 2013).

If prisoners wonder why attorneys are often reluctant to take prison-related civil rights cases, the paltry fee award in this case serves as an apt illustration. In other cases, attorneys have been awarded fees of $1.50 based on nominal damage awards; for example, in Bovin v. Black, 225 F.3d 36 (1st Cir. 2000) and Foult v. Charrier, 262 F.3d 687 (8th Cir. 2002) [PLN, Nov. 2002, p.21]. ■

Alabama DOC Short Hair Policy Does Not Violate RLUIPA

by David M. Reutter

THE ELEVENTH CIRCUIT HELD IN JULY 2013 that an Alabama Department of Corrections (ADOC) policy requiring prisoners to maintain short hair does not violate their rights under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA).

The appellate ruling was entered in a lawsuit initially filed in November 1993; it was the third time the case had come before the Court of Appeals. The suit, filed by Native American ADOC prisoners, was on appeal following a bench trial in which the district court ruled in favor of the ADOC's hair-length policy.

The Court of Appeals noted there was no dispute that the policy substantially burdens the religious exercise of Native American prisoners. It was also beyond dispute that the ADOC has compelling interests in security, discipline and hygiene within state prisons, and in the public's safety in the event of escapes if prisoners could subsequently alter their appearance by cutting their hair.

The district court's decision credited the ADOC's witnesses who testified as to how the hair-length policy addresses the concerns of prison officials. Alternatives such as exempting Native American prisoners from hair cuts, requiring prisoners to search their own long hair and using a computer program to manipulate prisoners' appearances to create pictures of what they would look like with short hair did not eliminate those concerns.

While the practices of other prison systems were relevant, the Eleventh Circuit said they were not controlling. "The ADOC has shown that its departure from the practices of other jurisdictions stems not from a stubborn refusal to accept a workable alternative, but rather a calculated decision not to absorb the added risks that its fellow institutions have chosen to tolerate," wrote the appellate court. "This cannot amount to a RLUIPA violation."

The fact that hair length standards for male and female prisoners differed also was unavailing, as the district court noted that male prisoners pose a greater threat than female prisoners. "RLUIPA does not require the ADOC to enforce a sex-blind hair length policy," the Court of Appeals held. The judgment of the district court was affirmed.

The plaintiffs filed a petition for writ of certiorari with the U.S. Supreme Court in February 2014, which remains pending. See: Knight v. Thompson, 723 F.3d 1275 (11th Cir. 2013). ■

Texas: Clerk May Not Bill Defendant for Attorney Fees Not Ordered by Court

by Matt Clarke

THE TEXAS COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS held last year that a district clerk may not send an indigent prisoner a bill of costs for court-appointed attorney fees in his criminal case when the court did not make a finding that he was able to pay the fees and never ordered them paid.

Pursuant to a plea bargain, Jefferie Anteries Daniel was convicted of forgery of a check in Bexar County, Texas in 2002. The trial court assessed court costs of $295.25 against him, but assessed no costs for a court-appointed attorney. Although it was apparent from the judgment that Daniel was represented by counsel, there was no indication the attorney had been appointed by the court.

More than nine years after his conviction, the Bexar County District Clerk sent Daniel a bill of costs in the forgery case that assessed both the $295.25 in court costs and an additional $7,945.00 in fees for an appointed attorney. Daniel filed a post-conviction petition for writ of habeas corpus, challenging the attorney fees being assessed without a court order and without a determination that he was able to pay. He asserted that he was indigent at trial and remained indigent and unable to pay the appointed attorney fees.

The trial court recommended dismissal of Daniel's petition, as it raised no issue which challenged his conviction, and the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals ordered additional fact finding. The trial court then found that there had been no hearing on Daniel's ability to pay court-appointed attorney fees after he was determined to be indigent, and recommended that relief be granted.

The Court of Criminal Appeals held the trial court was correct the first time in that the petition raised no issues challenging Daniel's conviction, and thus relief could not be granted under the habeas corpus statutes. However, the appellate court interpreted the petition as being one for a writ of mandamus, under which it could grant relief.

Referencing the requirements of Article 26.05(g), Texas Code of Criminal Procedure, and Mayer v. State, 309 S.W.3d 552 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010), the Court of Criminal Appeals held that "the defendant's financial resources and ability to pay are explicit critical elements in the trial court's determination of the propriety of ordering reimbursement of costs and fees." The Court found that the bill of costs "was not predicated upon any findings whatsoever with respect to these 'critical elements.'" Because no findings were made during the nine years between the entry of the judgment and the clerk's issuance of the bill of costs, there was "no basis for the assessment of attorney fees in the latter."

The appellate court declined to grant post-conviction relief, but taking the petition as one for mandamus, conditionally granted extraordinary relief and ordered the district clerk to remove from the bill of costs the assessment of court-appointed attorney fees. See: In re Daniel, 396 S.W.3d 545 (Tex. Crim. App. 2013). ■

Fifth Circuit: "Mailbox Rule" Applies to Texas State Habeas Petitions

THE FIFTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS has held that the "mailbox rule" of Houston v. Lack, 487 U.S. 266 (1988) now applies to determining the date when Texas prisoners file state habeas corpus petitions for the purpose of calculating the applicable period for the AEDPA's one-year statute of limitations in which to file federal habeas petitions.

Kenneth Richards, a Texas state prisoner, delivered a state petition for a writ of habeas corpus to prison authorities 329 days after his state criminal conviction became final. The court clerk did not stamp the petition as being filed for another 37 days. Twenty-two days after the petition was denied by the state court, Richards mailed his federal application for a writ of habeas corpus pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2254.

The respondent filed a motion for summary judgment based on untimeliness grounds. The district court granted the motion and dismissed the petition, and Richards appealed.

"A person in state custody has one year to apply for a writ of habeas corpus in federal court. 28 U.S.C. § 2244(d)(1). The one-year period begins to run, as relevant here, on the date the conviction became final at the conclusion of the time to seek direct review, § 2244(d)(1)(A), though the period is tolled while a properly filed state post-conviction petition is pending, § 2244(d)(2)," the Fifth Circuit wrote.

The appellate court noted that in Coleman v. Johnson, 184 F.3d 398 (5th Cir.

1999), it had held that under Texas law, the mailbox rule did not apply to state habeas petitions. However, in Campbell v. State, 320 S.W.3d 338 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010), the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals applied the mailbox rule to criminal proceedings, finding "that the pleadings of pro se inmates shall be deemed filed at the time they are delivered to prison authorities for forwarding to the court clerk."

Therefore, the Fifth Circuit held Coleman was no longer valid and the mailbox rule now applies to Texas prisoners' state habeas filings. The dismissal of Richards' petition was reversed and the case remanded for further proceedings. See: Richards v. Thaler, 710 F.3d 573 (5th Cir. 2013).

Following remand, Richards' habeas petition was dismissed by the federal district court on the merits in May 2014. He was challenging his 25-year sentence for possession of a cell phone in a correctional facility. See: Richards v. Stephens, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65098 (S.D. Tex. May 12, 2014). ■

Fifth Circuit Holds Prison Guard's Injury-Causing Reckless Driving States Nonfrivolous Claim

by Matt Clarke

THE FIFTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS held last year that a district court erred when it dismissed a prisoner's claim that he was severely injured when a guard driving a transport van slammed on the brakes, throwing the prisoner into the van's security cage.

Texas state prisoner Bruce A. Rogers was being transported from the Wayne Scott Unit to the Houston Veterans Hospital in June 2008 when Jose L. Garcia, Jr., the guard driving the van, slammed on the brakes. Rogers was seated on a bench perpendicular to the direction of travel. He was handcuffed and shackled with leg irons connected to the handcuffs by a chain, which prevented him from bracing himself. There were no seatbelts for prisoners.

According to Rogers, he hit the barrier of the van's security cage head-first and suffered head, neck, spinal, vision and hand injuries, including a three-inch laceration to his scalp that bled profusely and was "gouged open to the bone." Instead of checking on Rogers, the transport guards continued to the hospital.

The examining physician told them to take Rogers to the ER so his open, bleeding head wound could be treated. Instead, they returned Rogers to the Wayne Scott Unit and took him to the prison's infirmary.

This allegedly resulted in a 5-hour delay in treatment of his injuries and a delay of over a year before the full extent of his injuries was discovered after an MRI was finally performed.

Rogers filed a pro se 42 U.S.C. § 1983 civil rights action in federal court alleging Eighth Amendment violations for Garcia's reckless driving and the delay in medical treatment. The district court dismissed his complaint as frivolous and for failure to state a claim upon which relief may be granted under 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e)(2), without ordering service on the defendants. Rogers appealed.

Distinguishing this case from several previous cases in which it found that guards weren't liable when prisoners were injured in transportation accidents, the Fifth Circuit held that Rogers stated a nonfrivolous claim with respect to Garcia's reckless driving.

Rogers had alleged that Garcia was darting in and out of traffic at high speeds. He also claimed that when asked by another guard whether such injuries were common, Garcia replied "yes," just the previous week there had been an incident in which six prisoners were injured because a guard had slammed on the brakes, saying "it happens all the time, isn't a big deal." The appellate court held this additional allegation of reckless driving differentiated the case and stated a claim for more than mere negligence, as it indicated Garcia was deliberately indifferent to Rogers' safety. Therefore, that claim should not have been dismissed upon preliminary screening by the district court.

The dismissal of Rogers' claim related to the delay in medical treatment was affirmed, however, because the guards had taken him to a doctor at the Veterans Hospital and he had not shown that they knew the delay would pose a serious risk of substantial harm. The district court's dismissal of the non-driving transport guard and the guards' supervisor as defendants also was upheld. Accordingly, the reckless driving-related claim against Garcia was reinstated and the case remanded for further proceedings. One appellate judge, dissenting, would have upheld the dismissal of all the claims. See: Rogers v. Boatright, 709 F.3d 403 (5th Cir. 2013).

Following remand, Rogers moved to voluntarily dismiss his suit in October 2013, stating he did "not feel that [he] could receive a fair and impartial hearing concerning the outcome of this civil action," due to the district court's initial dismissal of the case. The court granted his motion and dismissed the action without prejudice. ■

Courts Struggle with Child Pornography Restitution Following Supreme Court Ruling

THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS is among the latest federal courts to tackle the issue of restitution for victims of child pornography – an issue addressed in a recent U.S. Supreme Court decision that legal observers say only muddies the waters for victims who attempt to recover damages from defendants in child porn cases.

The high court's ruling prompted quick action by two U.S. Senators to craft legislation designed to fix the perceived problem, but their proposed bill remains stalled in committee.

In November 2012, the Seventh Circuit held that victims in a child pornography case may intervene to defend the award of restitution in their favor, but only at the appellate level and only if they can prove that they suffered damages as a direct result of a defendant's actions.

The appellate court issued its decision in the appeal of Christopher L. Laraneta, who was sentenced by an Indiana federal district court to 30 years in prison and lifetime supervised release after pleading guilty to seven counts of violating federal child pornography laws. The district court also ordered him to pay $3.4 million in restitution to a victim known only by the pseudonym "Amy" and nearly $1 million to a second victim known as "Vicky," because he possessed images of them being raped when they were 8 and 9 years old. Those amounts represented the full amount of restitution awarded to the two victims.

The Seventh Circuit ruled that Laraneta could not be held responsible for the entire amount because "tens of thousands of pornographic images of Amy and Vicky" being sexually abused "have circulated on the Internet," raising the question of just how much harm Laraneta alone had caused them.

The determining factor, the Court of Appeals wrote, should be whether Laraneta was responsible for uploading and distributing the images. The Court held that without "a finding that he was a distributor, it is beyond implausible that the victims would have suffered the harm they did had he been the only person in the world to view pornographic images of them."

The Seventh Circuit also ruled that the district court lacked the legal authority to make Laraneta's restitution liability "joint and several" for Amy's and Vicky's total losses. Therefore, the appellate court "remanded for a redetermination not of the victims' total damages, which are conceded, but of the portion allocable to the defendant."

The ruling foreshadowed the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Paroline v. United States, 134 S.Ct. 1710 (2014), in which a sharply divided court determined that a defendant convicted of possessing child pornography can only be held responsible for damages suffered by the victim if the defendant "proximately caused" the victim's suffering. [See: PLN, Feb. 2014, p.20].

Writing for the majority, Justice Anthony M. Kennedy noted that a defendant should have to pay "for the consequences and gravity of their own conduct, not the conduct of others."

The circumstances of Laraneta's case are almost identical to those in Paroline. Doyle Randall Paroline pleaded guilty to possessing 150 to 300 images of child pornography, including two images of Amy, and was sentenced to two years in prison. The district court refused to order him to pay restitution on the grounds that federal prosecutors could not prove that Amy's suffering "would not have occurred without [Paroline's] possession of her images."

On appeal, the Fifth Circuit reversed the lower court and ordered Paroline to pay the entire $3.4 million in restitution – the same conclusion reached by the district court in Laraneta's case. The Court of Appeals held that it was up to Paroline, not Amy, to find other defendants who were also liable for Amy's suffering and could contribute to the full restitution amount.

On April 23, 2014, the Supreme Court reversed the Fifth Circuit and returned the case to the district court to determine how much restitution Paroline should have to pay. Justice Kennedy sought middle ground between the district court's initial determination that Paroline should pay none of the $3.4 million, and the Fifth Circuit's finding that he should pay all of it. He wrote that the only sensible way to decide the proper amount was for courts to order "reasonable and circumscribed" restitution "in an amount that comports with the defendant's relative role" in child pornography cases.

"This cannot be a precise mathematical inquiry and involves the use of discretion and sound judgment," Justice Kennedy stated. Justices Ginsburg, Breyer, Alito and Kagan joined Kennedy in crafting the majority opinion.

Legal observers said that by using such vague, imprecise language, Justice Kennedy set a nearly impossible standard for district courts to follow in determining restitution and, as a result, victims may never collect any damages.

Amy's disappointment in the ruling was immediate. "I am surprised and confused by the Court's decision," she wrote in the Washington Post. "I really don't understand where this leaves me and other victims who now have to live with trying to get restitution probably for the rest of our lives."

"The Supreme Court said we should keep going back to the district courts over and over again, but that's what I have been doing for almost six years now," she continued. "It's crazy that people keep committing this crime year after year and now victims like me have to keep reliving it year after year."

"I'm not sure how this decision helps anyone to really know if, when, and how restitution will ever be paid to kids and other victims of this endless crime. I see that the Court said I should get full restitution 'someday,' I just wonder when that day will be and how long I and Vicky and other victims will have to wait for justice."

Two U.S. Senators reacted quickly to the Supreme Court ruling, and crafted bipartisan legislation to address the murky issue of restitution in child porn cases.

On May 7, 2014, Senators Chuck Schumer and Orrin Hatch introduced the Amy and Vicky Child Pornography Victim Restitution Improvement Act (S.2301). Under the proposed legislation, federal courts would be required to consider the total harm to a victim, including any harm resulting from persons who have not yet been convicted of a crime involving the victim's image. The bill places the burden on the defendant instead of the victim to spread the cost of the total restitution amount among other defendants.

"The tragic effect of the Supreme Court's decision in Paroline was this: the more widely viewed the pornographic image of a victim, and the more offenders there are, the more difficult it is for the victim to recover for her anguish and her damages," Schumer explained. "But there should not be safety in numbers."

"Senator Hatch and I, and our other co-sponsors, will work hard to make sure victims of these most heinous of crimes get, at a minimum, what they are entitled to get – full restitution for the full harm caused by these terrible acts."

The legislation would allow victims to collect full restitution for all suffering throughout their lifetimes, including the cost of therapy, medical expenses, lost income and attorney's fees. The bill would permit – but not require – judges to order defendants to pay the full amount of restitution, and would set minimum restitution of $25,000 in child pornography cases (higher for more severe offenses, including $150,000 for distribution and $250,000 for production).

If there are multiple defendants convicted of crimes involving the same victim, the bill states, a defendant can sue to share the cost of restitution among the other defendants.

In Laraneta's case, the Seventh Circuit held that Amy was entitled to intervene to protect her interest in receiving restitution, but "it would be a mistake to allow intervention at the district court level." Such intervention would be a "recipe for chaos." For example, the appellate court envisioned a plea bargain in which the victim argues for a different agreement than that struck between the defense and the prosecution. Or perhaps a trial in which victims' attorneys present witnesses, cross examine the defendants' witnesses or participate at sentencing to persuade the judge to enter a harsher sentence.

The Court of Appeals ruled that complications of intervention at the appellate stage, however, are fewer because participation is limited to the filing of briefs and, at the appellate court's discretion, participation in oral arguments.

"The case for intervention is most compelling when a person has a direct financial stake in a case and cannot be certain that any party has an interest in defending that stake," the Seventh Circuit wrote. "The government has no financial stake in restitution to victims of crime."

The Court of Appeals remanded the case to determine the amount of Laraneta's restitution. See: United States v. Laraneta, 700 F.3d 983 (7th Cir. 2012), rehearing en banc denied, cert. denied.

As of August 2014, the restitution hearings for both Laraneta and Paroline remained pending before the district courts in their respective criminal cases. ■

Prison Labor Boosts Wal-Mart's Profits Despite Pledge

by Derek Gilna

THE SUPPLIER PLEDGE FOR AMERICA'S largest retailer states: "Forced or prison labor will not be tolerated by Wal-Mart. Wal-Mart will not accept products from Vendor Partners who utilize in any manner forced labor or prison labor in the manufacture or in their contracting, subcontracting or other relationships for the manufacture of their products."

However, the company has become a retailing behemoth in the United States and abroad by carefully watching its bottom line and squeezing every ounce of profit out of each component in its supply chain. Recent developments, which include reports concerning the use of prison labor and alleged abuses in labor practices by its suppliers, have called into question whether Wal-Mart is the good corporate citizen it claims to be.

One area in which Wal-Mart has profited through the use of prison labor is in "demanufacturing." That term refers to the disposal of millions of dollars' worth of "customer returns, buy-backs, over-stocks, shelf-pulls, scratch-and-dent, and excess inventories" that all large retailers must contend with, according to Al Norman, the founder of Sprawl Busters. What separates Wal-Mart from other retailers is its use of what amounts to taxpayer-subsidized prison labor in the demanufacturing process.

Of course, Wal-Mart is not directly involved in that process. Rather, it relies on sub-contractors; the company just reaps the bottom-line benefits. Suppliers and sub-contractors, eager to expand their sales and increase their profits, are only too willing to contract with Wal-Mart. Before long, they are virtual "captives" of the mammoth retailer, dependent on their contracts with the company for their economic survival and willing to cut corners to preserve their profit margins.

In fairness, Wal-Mart did not originate this practice. When the firm was in its infancy, Sears Roebuck & Company was accused of a similar strategy – becoming the primary purchaser of a supplier's products, then threatening to discontinue purchases unless they received various concessions such as lower prices. Suppliers were sometimes even absorbed into the company. But while Sears may have pioneered the process for becoming a powerhouse retailer, Wal-Mart has greatly refined it.

According to the Huffington Post, one of Wal-Mart's demanufacturing partners is Minnesota-based Jacobs Trading Company, or JTC – which, based on its confidential agreement with Wal-Mart, "remove(s) all of the identifying marks, including, but not limited to, manufacturer's or retailer's names, logos, serial number, UPC numbers, RA numbers, and other identifying marks ... from the packaging, or to clearly and conspicuously mark the packaging so that it is readily apparent and obvious that the Merchandise has been through a salvage process."

JTC has made a great deal of money by selling customer returns, overstock and close-out merchandise from nine distribution centers, including in Taft, Oklahoma. There, around 25 female prisoners at the Eddie Warrior Correctional Center process semi-loads of merchandise from JTC, remove any identifying marks, bar codes and labels, and palletize and reship the goods nationwide for resale, according to the Oklahoma Department of Corrections.

In Nevada, around 60 prisoners perform similar tasks for JTC. The work is "physically demanding and requires cognitive and motor skills and problem-solving abilities," according to one prisoner worker. The products being demanufactured and processed include not only clothing but also compressors, ceiling fans, yard lights and other items from various retailers.

JTC has reportedly operated demanufacturing programs using prison labor in other states, too.

Unfortunately, the U.S. Department of Justice is a willing accomplice in this exploitative practice. The Prison Industry Enhancement Certification Program (PIECP), passed by Congress in 1979, authorizes the DOJ "to establish employment opportunities for offenders that approximate private-sector work ... to place inmates in a realistic work environment, pay them the prevailing local wage for similar work, and enable them to acquire marketable skills..." [See: PLN, March 2010, p.1].

However, prisoners in PIECP programs typically do not receive the "prevailing wage" – only the federal minimum wage, which is subject to deductions of up to 80% for room and board, victim restitution, taxes, etc. Further, prisoners engaged in "service" work, as opposed to manufacturing goods, are not paid the minimum wage. JTC's prison program in Oklahoma isn't even classified as a PIECP program.

It is not only in the area of "demanufacturing" that Wal-Mart benefits from prison labor to boost its profits. Several large agribusiness companies, such as Martori Farms in Arizona, have used prisoner workers to supply their corporate buyers – including Wal-Mart – in spite of the company's supplier pledge.

According to the Arizona Department of Corrections, the state has supplied prison labor for private agricultural businesses for almost 20 years. Since Arizona fines farmers who use undocumented workers, there was pressure on state officials to make up the labor shortfall by utilizing prisoners to perform farm work. [See: PLN, May 2012, p.1; Feb. 2008, p.16].

TruthOut, an independent online news site, reported that Martori Farms employed female prisoners in Arizona and paid them around $2.00 per hour in net wages. Martori, which has supplied Wal-Mart with fruits and vegetables for over two decades, bussed the women from the Perryville Unit early in the morning to the company's fields, where they worked in all kinds of conditions and weather.

Prisoners complained of abusive supervisors, difficult working conditions and substandard medical care. Complaints about these conditions often brought threats of retaliation, incident reports that could lead to loss of privileges such as commissary and phone calls, and possible loss of "good time" credits that reduce a prisoner's sentence for good behavior.

According to Martori representative Joe Oddo, the company discontinued using prison labor in 2012 due to "negative press" by the news media, among other concerns. Martori had employed approximately 100 Arizona prisoners to pick crops.

Outside the prison context, the labor practices of Wal-Mart's suppliers have drawn scrutiny in California, Illinois and New Jersey. Over $1 million in fines was levied in connection with wage and hour violations at a California warehouse operated by a Wal-Mart sub-contractor, Schneider Logistics. Illinois workers employed by a Wal-Mart contractor filed a class-action suit alleging wage violations, while New Jersey workers have been fired for complaining about a lack of safety equipment.

However, Wal-Mart's connection with prison labor has gone largely unnoticed even though prisoners typically work in substandard conditions for low pay, and lack the benefits and safeguards afforded non-incarcerated employees. Prisoners whose labor is exploited have few advocates despite the fact that similar behavior by companies like Wal-Mart in the freeworld employment market, whether domestically or overseas, would result in public outrage.

Not that Wal-Mart is the only major retailer that has benefitted from prison labor. Kmart and Saks Fifth Avenue have been linked to goods produced by prisoners in China, as has Primark, a British-owned company that sells clothing in Europe.

For example, in 2012 an Oregon resident, Julie Keith, found a letter written by a prisoner at a Chinese forced labor camp tucked inside a box of Halloween decorations she had purchased at Kmart. Also in 2012, Stephanie Wilson, a shopper at Saks, found a letter from a Chinese prisoner in a paper shopping bag. "We are ill-treated and work like slaves for 13 hours every day producing these bags in bulk in the prison factory," the letter stated. And in 2014, a woman in Northern Ireland found a plea for help written in Chinese, wrapped around a prison identification card, hidden in a pair of pants she had purchased at Primark. ■

$2.85 Million Jury Verdict for Suicide at Missouri Jail

by Derek Gilna

ON JANUARY 18, 2013, FOLLOWING A five-day trial, a jury in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri returned a verdict of $2.85 million against the City of Sullivan, finding that negligence by employees at the Sullivan County Jail had led to the suicide of detainee Karen A. Palmer. Palmer had been arrested and booked into the facility on trespassing charges in 2009, and the mother of her fiancé had advised jail officials that Palmer was suicidal and required constant observation.

Jail supervisors and guards ignored that warning, however, and Palmer used the string in the hood of her sweatshirt to hang herself. Although guards initially claimed that they had monitored the video camera in her cell every ten minutes, her body was not found for more than two hours.

After Palmer's death, her mother and other family members representing her estate sued the city and jail employees, alleging that Palmer "was in obvious need of serious medical care in that she suffered from a known depression condition and/or was an obvious substantial risk of harm to herself."

The magistrate judge handling pretrial motions granted summary judgment in favor of the city and the Sullivan police department on the plaintiffs' deliberate indifference claim, but allowed a negligence claim to proceed. One of Palmer's attorneys, Donald Schlappizzi, convinced the jury of the culpability of jail officials based in large part on video footage that showed they had failed to properly monitor Palmer's cell at the time she committed suicide.

The jury awarded $1.3 million in actual damages and a combined total of $1,550,000 against four individual jail employees – Jeff Rohrer, Don Reed, Shaun Hinson and Kevin Halbert – for "aggravating circumstances." Schlappizzi said Palmer's family "believes they were vindicated" by the verdict, and that the jurors "spoke as the conscience of the community." See: Tanner v. City of Sullivan, U.S.D.C. (E.D. Mo.), Case No. 4:11-cv-01361-NAB.

The defendants filed a motion for judgment as a matter of law, or for a new trial or remittitur of the damages award, which was denied by the district court in June 2013. They appealed the verdict the following month, posting a bond in the amount of $2.86 million. The appeal remains pending before the Eighth Circuit. ■

Recidivism Performance Measures for Private Halfway Houses in Pennsylvania

by Alex Friedmann

IN 2013, PENNSYLVANIA DEPARTMENT OF Corrections (DOC) officials announced they would provide financial incentives to privately-operated community corrections facilities – halfway houses – that reduce the recidivism rates of offenders released from those facilities.

The unique initiative followed a DOC report that found high recidivism rates in the state, with prisoners released from halfway houses (most of which are privately-operated) having higher rates than those released directly from prison. For example, for 2010-11 releasees, the one-year overall recidivism rate was 40.5% for those paroled to a community corrections facility but only 32.7% for those released from prison.

An average recidivism rate based on data from the report was established as a baseline, and privately-operated community corrections facilities are required to meet the baseline rate within a certain range or risk losing their contracts. Those that achieve rates at least 10% lower than the baseline will receive a financial bonus of one percent of the contract amount.

“It’s not unreasonable for us to expect them to have an impact on crime, because that’s what we’re paying them to do,” said Pennsylvania Department of Corrections Secretary John E. Wetzel.

“We want to measure performance. We want quantifiable performance,” added Kristofer Bret Bucklen, director of the DOC’s Office of Planning, Research and Statistics.

The DOC’s community corrections contracts were rebid in 2013 to include the recidivism rate performance measure provisions. According to Bucklen, the initial performance measure period was based on recidivism data for an abbreviated three-month span from December 2013 to March 2014, while future periods will cover six-month spans.

Bucklen said the state’s approximately 40 privately-operated community corrections facilities achieved an average 16.4% reduction in recidivism – although this reflected a very modest decrease in recidivism rates, as the benchmark for the initial three-month period was 12.8%, which on average dropped to 10.7% (the performance measure benchmark for future six-month periods will be around 30%).

Nine of the facilities significantly reduced recidivism rates during the initial period and qualified to receive a contractual bonus; one facility significantly exceeded the benchmark and was placed on warning status. This indicates that given the proper incentives (financial bonuses) and disincentives (potential loss of contracts), private contractors can be motivated to meet specified standards. Future recidivism performance measures by the Pennsylvania DOC will demonstrate whether positive results are achieved on an ongoing basis.

However, one weakness of the DOC’s approach is that, according to Mr. Bucklen, recidivism rates are considered only for the benchmark periods (six months each after the initial period), but not cumulatively over longer periods of time. That is, one-year and three-year recidivism rates for privately-operated community corrections facilities are tracked but not considered for performance measure purposes. Thus, it’s possible that the long-term recidivism rates at such facilities may in fact be higher than the corresponding benchmarks for those time periods, if offenders released from private halfway houses recidivate at higher rates over an extended period of time, but the contractors would not be penalized.

The Pennsylvania DOC is the only known state prison system that has tied performance by contractors to recidivism rates. ■

Incarceration is Excusable Default in New York Housing Court Proceeding

by Mark Wilson

ON OCTOBER 7, 2013, THE NEW YORK City Housing Court held that a tenant who could not attend court proceedings due to incarceration was entitled to relief from a default judgment.

Otto Thompson, 57, who is disabled, had lived in his rent-controlled apartment in New York City since 1963. He paid the $450.25 monthly rent from his SSI benefits.

In 2006 or 2007, Jose Salmon became Thompson’s roommate and remained in the apartment after Thompson was arrested and incarcerated at Rikers Island pending criminal charges in October 2008. The landlord then initiated eviction proceedings, alleging that Thompson had illegally sub-let his apartment to Salmon.

Thompson was ultimately convicted and sentenced to five years in prison. After several continuances, the Inquest Court signed a judgment of eviction on February 8, 2010, and a warrant of eviction was executed on April 30, 2010.

Following his release, Thompson moved for relief from default on April 13, 2013. Finding that “incarceration can be the basis for excusable default,” citing Benado v. Antonio, 10 A.D.2d 40, 197 N.Y.S. 2d 1 (N.Y. App. Div. 1st Dep’t 1960), the Civil Court of the City of New York granted the motion.

The court found that Thompson was denied due process and had presented an excusable default for his failure to appear. He “was incarcerated at the time of the inquest, but made many and varied attempts to respond to the proceeding, which establish that his failure to appear was not willful and that his incarceration constituted a reasonable excuse to vacate the default.”

Further, a Guardian Ad Litem (GAL) should have been appointed for Thompson because he could not adequately defend his rights under the circumstances, the court concluded, stating: “Failure to appoint a GAL will otherwise deprive the litigant of basic due process rights and an opportunity to be heard.” See: 46 Downing Street LLC v. Thompson, Civil Court, City of New York, New York County, Case No. L & T81450/2009. ■

Indiana Supreme Court Holds Agreed Court Order with Prosecutor is Binding on DOC

by Matt Clarke

THE SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA HAS held that a court order regarding whether a sex offender could be retroactively classified as a Sexually Violent Predator (SVP), and required to register as a sex offender every 90 days for life, was binding on the Indiana Department of Corrections (DOC) even though the DOC was not a party in the case.

Ronald G. Becker was convicted of Class B felony criminal deviate conduct and sentenced to six years in prison. He registered as a sex offender after his release; at that time, Indiana state law required him to register annually for ten years.

The law was later amended, instituting heightened registration requirements for SVPs. The amended law required that SVPs register every 90 days for life and made criminal deviate conduct a conviction which established SVP status as a matter of law.

After Becker was notified that he was required to register every 90 days, he petitioned the sentencing court for an order relieving him of the additional SVP obligations. The court found that SVP status did not exist when Becker was sentenced and retroactively classifying him as an SVP violated the prohibition against ex post facto laws. The court issued an order that Becker only needed to register annually. The prosecutor did not appeal the order.

After having registered for ten years, Becker sought clarification of the earlier order which had not specifically stated that he was exempt from registering for life on ex post facto grounds. Represented by the prosecutor, the state entered into an agreed order, based on the earlier court order, that stated Becker was only required to register for ten years and no longer had to register. Two weeks later, the Indiana Supreme Court rejected an ex post facto argument identical to Becker's in Lemmon v. Harris, 949 N.E.2d 803 (Ind. 2011).

Representing the DOC, the Attorney General intervened and filed a motion to have the agreed order corrected based on the Supreme Court's subsequent ruling in Harris. The trial court granted the DOC's motion and ordered Becker to register every 90 days for life. He appealed, arguing that the agreed order was res judicata relative to the DOC's motion.

The Court of Appeals found that the agreed order was not binding on the DOC because changes in the law – not the DOC – had caused Becker to become an SVP. See: Becker v. State, 2012 Ind. App. Unpub. LEXIS 709 (Ind. Ct. App. 2012). Becker then appealed to the Indiana Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court held that although its ruling in Harris was indistinguishable from the ex post facto issue raised by Becker, the agreed court order had been litigated by the prosecutor, who was an entity of “the State” with the same interest regarding the sex offender registry as the DOC. Thus, the agreed order was res judicata against “the State” and prevented the DOC, another entity of the state, from relitigating the issue.

Accordingly, the judgment of the trial court was reversed. Becker was represented by Schererville, Indiana attorney Mark A. Bates. See: Becker v. State, 992 N.E.2d 697 (Ind. 2013). ■

Some GPS Monitoring Devices Capable of Audio Recording

by Christopher Zoukis

CIVIL LIBERTARIANS AND PRISONER advocacy groups have expressed shock and outrage at the discovery that some Global Positioning System (GPS) tracking devices, used to monitor the movement and whereabouts of many pre-trial defendants, parolees, sex offenders and other persons, function like cell phones and are capable of recording conversations without the knowledge or consent of the people wearing them – including confidential conversations with their attorneys.

The audio recording technology first came to light in Puerto Rico, when defense attorney Fermín L. Arraiza-Navas asked a client during a meeting in San Juan about the GPS ankle bracelet he was wearing as a condition of his bail.

“They speak to me through that thing,” the man said.

During a court hearing on a motion subsequently filed by Arraiza-Navas to have his client's GPS device removed, a technician for SecureAlert, the company that manufactures the monitors, revealed their true capabilities. The technician – who testified through the cell phone feature of a GPS ankle bracelet – told the court that although the device is supposed to vibrate and give an audible warning when activated, it can be turned on at will and without warning.

Proponents of the technology argue that it enhances accountability and the ability of authorities to contact the wearer in emergencies. They point to the real-time monitoring of the devices as an essential deterrent, because here-and-now tracking allows law enforcement to be notified if the wearer violates any movement restrictions.

The wearer can also press a panic button to initiate a call to a SecureAlert support technician, and technicians can call individual GPS monitors to speak with the wearers. But while the devices emit a loud tone and the phrase “secure alert,” or vibrate when the line is opened or closed, the alert function can be bypassed. Thus, an open connection to a monitoring device can be established without the knowledge of the wearer.

Assistant San Juan District Attorney Erika Quiñones-González denied in court that the device infringes on a defendant's constitutional rights, asserting that “the supervised defendant is warned by a vibration and sound before the line is open to allow communication,” and that the device emits an audio alert when the phone call is over.

However, Arraiza-Navas pointed out that the GPS monitor emitted no alarm or signal when the courtroom communication with the SecureAlert technician ended. Further, he told the court that the system's operator said the device could be activated “unilaterally” by SecureAlert, and that “the conversations could be heard.”

Arraiza-Navas argued that the high-tech ability of the devices oversteps the state’s right to monitor defendants. “It cannot be supported by law that in order to be set free under bail, [persons] charged with a crime have to waive their right to privacy and to keep their conversations with attorneys confidential,” he wrote. He decried the monitoring as “flagrantly unconstitutional.”

Other legal experts suggested that the ability of government officials and private companies to secretly listen in on and record private conversations violates the Fourth Amendment, the Federal Wiretap Act and various states’ constitutions.

William Ramírez, executive director of the Puerto Rico Chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union, said the right to privacy and right against self-incrimination could be infringed if defendants are not notified that their conversations can be monitored or recorded by the Pretrial Services Office or SecureAlert.

Victor A. Meléndez-Lugo, who heads the Appeals Division of the Puerto Rico Legal Aid Society, said the possibility of such surreptitious eavesdropping is “shocking.”

“The recording or interception of phone calls in Puerto Rico constitutes a crime,” he noted. “If that is happening in Puerto Rico it has to stop happening since yesterday.”

The government’s ability “to listen and/or record the unauthorized conversations between a defendant with his or her lawyer through an electronic GPS bracelet represents the most absolute and gross infringement to that person’s constitutional rights,” added Puerto Rico legal expert Carlos E. Ramos, a professor at the Inter-American University Law School.

Other civil libertarians agreed. “If it allows eavesdropping or to record conversations, [it] is a very important issue that is worth exploring,” said Ben Wizner, senior staff attorney for the ACLU in Washington, D.C.

The issue is not a minor one; as many as 200,000 people in the U.S. are subject to some sort of electronic monitoring devices. [See: PLN, March 2012, p.20].

“If law enforcement agencies anywhere in this country are using such microphone-equipped GPS ankle bracelets they must, at a minimum, make both a general disclosure of that fact to the public and our elected representatives, as well as a specific and complete disclosure of that fact to each and every person who might wear one of those ankle bracelets, as well as to his or her attorney,” stated Jerry J. Cox, president of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers. ■

Volunteers Help Prisoners Vote at D.C. Jail

FOR MOST PRISONERS IN JAIL AWAITING trial, voting is an afterthought. But volunteers at the District of Columbia jail manned the polls for the first two days of early voting in October 2012 and instructed prisoners on how to fill out ballots.

After recording prisoners' names and precincts, the volunteers flipped through stacks of absentee ballots and explained how to darken the bubbles to record their votes.

"Remember to vote both sides of the ballot," advised poll worker Arlin Budoo. Nearby sat a stack of "I Voted" stickers.

There are an estimated 700,000 people across the country sitting in jail pending trial or serving time for misdemeanors, all of whom can vote, provided – in most states – that they haven't been disenfranchised by a past felony conviction. The problem, according to Marc Mauer, executive director of The Sentencing Project, is that most jails aren't doing what volunteers in Washington, D.C. do to ensure that eligible prisoners vote.

"In the vast majority of jails there's absolutely nothing being done to make that happen," he said.

The Sentencing Project reported that about 2.5% of the total U.S. voting age population – one of every 40 adults – was disenfranchised in 48 states as of December 2010 due to a current or previous felony conviction. That amounts to around 5.8 million people nationwide.

In February 2014, U.S. Attorney General Eric H. Holder, Jr. focused national attention on voting rights for ex-offenders by framing it as a civil rights issue. Holder urged states that have not relaxed their disenfranchisement laws to grant voting rights to former prisoners to do so.

The movement has gained momentum around the nation, with nearly two dozen states loosening their voting rights statutes over the past 15 years.

Just last year in Virginia, then-Governor Robert F. McDonnell did away with the requirement that qualified non-violent felons had to apply for restoration of their voting rights. In April 2014, current Governor Terry McAuliffe announced he would automatically restore voting rights to offenders who had completed their sentences for violent drug-related crimes, and reduce the waiting period for other violent felonies from five years to three years (provided that all court-ordered costs, fines and restitution had been paid).

The District of Columbia has made increasing efforts to help jail prisoners vote; for many decades, the District has been ahead of the states in relaxing Reconstruction-era prohibitions that exempt most current and former prisoners from the political franchise.

As a result, more types of offenders can vote in the District of Columbia than almost anywhere else, including parolees, released prisoners on probation and those who are out on bond or wearing electronic monitoring devices. Offenders in jail who are otherwise eligible can also vote; hundreds of ballots were delivered to the D.C. Jail for the last mayoral primary in April 2014.

In Washington, it's not just ex-offenders who are pushing the issue but churches, new residents to the capital city and a coalition of organizations that view voting rights for former prisoners as a social-justice priority.

A 2008 survey indicated that 60,000 D.C. residents had a criminal record, according to Charles Thornton, director of the city's newly-renamed Office on Returning Citizen Affairs. He noted that figure is certainly higher now, and estimated that one in seven adults, roughly 75,000 Washington, D.C. residents, have criminal records.

Thornton, who himself served time in the 1980s on federal drug charges, said as many as 8,000 D.C. residents are released every year from the city's jail and federal prisons combined. In addition, court records indicate that approximately 22,000 residents are under some form of correctional supervision, including probation.

An estimated 10,000 ex-offenders in D.C. were registered to vote prior to the 2008 presidential election, and according to Courtney Stewart, chairman of the Reentry Network for Returning Citizens, which organizes voter registration drives in the District, nearly 4,000 more registered before the city's 2010 mayoral election.

"It's a growing force," stated city Councilman Marion Barry, a former Washington, D.C. mayor who is also a well-known ex-offender, having served six months in federal prison for possession of crack cocaine. In the 2010 election, nearly 450 prisoners at the D.C. Jail voted by absentee ballot; in the 2012 general election, 174 prisoners at the jail and Correctional Treatment Facility in D.C. voted.

"We need more returning citizens to know they can vote," Councilman Barry said, "and more to get out and vote." ■

Some States Refuse to Implement SORNA, Lose Federal Grants

AS OF AUGUST 2014, TWENTY-EIGHT states were still struggling with the costs and bureaucratic nuisance of implementing the Sex Offender Registration and Notification Act (SORNA) – also known as the Adam Walsh Act – eight years after it was passed by Congress. Another 17 states were in compliance and five have flatly refused, mostly for political or fiscal reasons.

But only one state – Nebraska – has stated a principled opposition to SORNA's lifetime registry requirement for juveniles. State Senator Amanda McGill, a member of the Nebraska legislature's Judiciary Committee, said that SORNA as currently written could force people onto the registry who don't belong there.

"We may be putting resources into people that don't need it," she said, "and possibly 'scarlet-lettering' them."

SORNA, which had a soft deadline of July 2011 for implementation, requires that states adopt certain provisions for their sex offender registries or face significant cuts in federal Byrne Justice Assistance Grants (JAG), which are used to fund local courts, crime labs, prisons and jails, and other law enforcement programs. Of the states that missed the deadline, most agreed they would apply to use JAG money to comply with SORNA in order to continue receiving the federal funds. [See: PLN, July 2010, p.24].

But five states – Arizona, Arkansas, California, Texas and Nebraska – have neither complied with SORNA nor applied to use JAG funds to come into compliance, thereby electing to forfeit 10% of their JAG funding. [See, e.g.: PLN, Feb. 2012, p.20].

"We're hoping that in the future, some of those five will indeed apply," said Linda Baldwin, director of the U.S. Department of Justice's Office of Sex Offender Sentencing, Monitoring, Apprehending, Registering and Tracking. Not applying to use the JAG funds for compliance is "not necessarily a refusal," she added, noting that those states will have another chance to apply to use JAG funds for SORNA compliance.

Arizona, which is making a states' rights argument against implementing SORNA – an unfunded federal mandate – might change its mind depending on the future political landscape. California and Texas are citing economic reasons for their refusal to comply.

Nebraska, meanwhile, attempted to comply with SORNA in 2010 by changing its sex offender registry to categorize offenders by their convictions rather than by the individualized risk assessments the state had more thoughtfully used previously. The change not only forced Nebraska – and other states attempting to comply – to enact changes in its criminal code, but also forced many offenders who had already served their sentences to be placed on sex offender registries or increased the length of time they were required to register.

"I hadn't been in any kind of trouble since completing probation," said Daniel Konecky, a now lifetime-registered sex offender, when he testified at a hearing before Nebraska's Judiciary Committee in 2011. Konecky pleaded no contest to second-degree sexual assault of a minor after he was accused of having consensual sex with a 15-year-old girl when he was 23. His public defender assured Konecky that he faced only two or three years on probation and wouldn't be listed on the public sex offender registry.

"I feel like I'm being punished again for the rest of my life," Konecky said, "after serving my punishment and proving my worth by living righteously, being a good father and husband, and staying out of trouble."

The fiscal costs of SORNA compliance – such as expanding a state's sex offender registry and adding extra law enforcement officers for the multiple check-ins each year required of offenders – were too much for Texas and California.

Texas estimated that its cost to implement SORNA would be at least $38 million, while according to the National Conference of State Legislatures, the cost of losing the JAG funds would be just $2.2 million. Tina Walker, chief of media relations for California's Emergency Management Agency, said compliance could exceed $30 million and would result in "a less than robust sex offender registration process for the state." California would lose an estimated $3.2 million in JAG funding.

Arizona's attitude toward SORNA compliance is based largely on its long-standing fixation on federalism. Not only do Arizona officials feel the state's sex offender registry does a better job of protecting the public than the federal government would, but – following Governor Jan Brewer's lead – the state finds itself increasingly opposed to federal initiatives simply on the grounds of states' rights.

"They agree with the importance of sharing information across states but don't necessarily think all aspects of SORNA's approach to registration are better than what they already have in place," said Elizabeth Pyke, director of government affairs at the National Criminal Justice Association. "So if implementing SORNA will make them overturn long-held policies, some states may prefer sticking with their own registry systems."

The resistance among the hold-out states forced a proposed revision to SORNA. When the law was considered for reauthorization by Congress in early 2012, legislators modified the penalty provisions for JAG funding, and the law would no longer require juveniles convicted of sex offenses to have to register for life. Further, SORNA would allocate $3 million in state funding for sex offender treatment for juvenile offenders. Regardless, the proposed reauthorization bill failed to pass. ■

News in Brief

Brazil: Brazilian authorities announced on January 15, 2014 that an investigation would be initiated into atrocities at the infamous Pedrinhas penitentiary. Bloody battles between rival prison gangs resulted in complaints of mass rapes of women visitors and the posting of a video depicting decapitated and tortured prisoners. In 2013, 60 prisoners died in uprisings at the facility. "The state urgently needs to investigate these crimes, restore order in the prisons, and ensure the inmates' safety," said Maria Laura Canineu, director of Brazil's Human Rights Watch.

California: On January 14, 2014, U.S. District Court Judge Lawrence J. O'Neill ordered a week-long suspension of federal criminal case hearings for prisoners at the Fresno County jail due to a flu outbreak. O'Neill's order noted that one prisoner who had appeared in his court had subsequently been diagnosed with H1N1 influenza and another had died of flu complications. The Fresno County Sheriff's Office quarantined hundreds of prisoners in response to the outbreak, which killed at least 10 people in the central San Joaquin Valley. The jail houses more than 2,900 prisoners; at the time of O'Neill's order, 135 of those prisoners faced federal charges.

Florida: A prison guard who worked at the Zephyrhills Correctional Institution was arrested on December 21, 2013 on charges of domestic battery and driving under the influence. Geoffrey Laurent Linder, 39, was charged following an incident at a local club in which he slapped his ex-wife in a dispute over her decision to bring their young daughter into a bar. Shortly after the assault, Pasco County deputies pulled Linder over and discovered he was glassy-eyed, had slurred speech and was unsteady on his feet. He reeked of alcohol and a Breathalyzer test showed his blood alcohol content to be nearly double the state's legal limit of .08. Following his arrest, Linder posted $150 bail and was released. In 2009, he had been arrested on disorderly conduct and resisting arrest charges stemming from an incident involving Pasco County deputies.

Florida: Corporal James Brooks, who worked at the Naples Jail Center, was arrested on December 23, 2013 and subsequently fired after arranging to purchase a stolen laptop from a recently-released prisoner. Brooks allegedly approached a prisoner who was nearing his release date and asked him to steal a laptop, for which Brooks would pay half the retail value. The prisoner notified jail administrators of the offer prior to his release, then worked with investigators to set up the exchange. At the time of the transaction, Brooks offered to trade prescription pills for the stolen laptop. He pleaded not guilty to felony charges of dealing in stolen property, conspiracy and drug trafficking. Previously, Brooks had been reprimanded for allowing work-release prisoners to patronize a convenience store while under his supervision.

Florida: Marion County jail guards Richard Smith and Dustin Lay were found not guilty of assaulting a prisoner on January 3, 2014. They had faced misdemeanor charges stemming from the beating of prisoner Donald Kizzart in the medical wing of the jail after attempting to move him to another part of the facility. A third guard, Janet Lucky, witnessed the attack and called it an excessive use of force. Two other jail workers corroborated her story, but a nurse who examined Kizzart after the incident testified that Kizzart's injuries were inconsistent with the eyewitness accounts. Defense attorneys argued that Lucky had exaggerated her statements to cause trouble for Lay.

Guam: Matthew Gill and Michael Martinez, two Guam prison guards fired in December 2013, denied using Tasers to torture prisoners in their custody. According to the Department of Corrections, four prisoners received treatment for Taser-related injuries, although guards are not trained on Taser use and are prohibited from carrying them. Internal Affairs investigator Jeff Limo said Gill and Martinez were terminated "based on their conduct on duty."

Hawaii: James "Kimo" Sanders III, a guard at the Halawa prison, appeared in federal court on January 13, 2014 to face several charges of selling meth at the facility, as well as accepting bribes for delivering contraband. Sanders was arrested in the parking lot of the prison; he is accused of distributing at least five grams of meth on November 15, 2013 and at least 50 grams of meth a week later. He was not immediately terminated by the Department of Public Safety, though Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Nammar noted that "someone who admitted to smuggling meth and tobacco shouldn't be allowed to work at a prison facility." Following a guilty plea, Sanders was sentenced on July 10, 2014 to four years in prison on each count, to be served concurrently.

Illinois: On December 30, 2013, a guard conducting a cell check at the Cook County Jail found 17-year-old Tyshawn Carter hanging from a bedsheet attached to his bunk. The suicide was the sixth at the jail in 2013. Carter had been charged as an adult with armed robbery and was scheduled for a court appearance the following week. He had not been placed on suicide watch, but a guard had performed a cell check less than seven minutes before his body was found. Cook County Sheriff's Office spokeswoman Cara Smith said of suicide prevention at the jail: "Despite all the efforts we go through, it's an imperfect science.... We do everything we can."

Kentucky: When Robert Vick, 42, escaped from the minimum-security Blackburn Correctional Complex on January 5, 2014, he apparently didn't bother to check the weather report. Wind chill temperatures dipped to 20 below zero the following day, and Vick eventually walked into a motel lobby and asked the clerk to call the police because he wanted to turn himself in to escape the frigid weather. He was wearing prison-issued khakis when he absconded and was treated by paramedics for exposure to the cold before being returned to Blackburn.

Kenya: A former death row prisoner who had hoped to receive a pardon mutilated himself after he was denied clemency. In December 2013, Francis Karuri was mopping a cellblock floor when a radio broadcast announced Kenyan President Uhuru Kenyatta's annual list of pardons. When he realized his name had not been called, Karuri cut off his own penis with a razor, then continued mopping the floor until he collapsed from blood loss. Prisoners say Karuri had struggled with depression and had recently been transferred to a section of the facility for mentally ill prisoners.

Louisiana: Angola Penitentiary warden Burl Cain announced that prison guard LeAngela Handy, arrested on December 24, 2013, had a "drug store" in her bra. Cain said the 42-year-old guard's undergarment was stuffed with crystal meth, cocaine, crack cocaine, marijuana, Lortab and Xanax. She also allegedly had several cigars and a cell phone secreted inside her bra as she entered the prison. Handy was booked into the West Feliciana Parish Detention Center on multiple drug possession and misconduct charges; her bond was set at $25,000.

Maryland: Prince George's County State's Attorney Angela Alsobrooks called the actions of former deputy Lamar McIntyre "reprehensible and embarrassing" after he pleaded guilty to having sex with a female prisoner. The encounter took place in a courthouse holding cell while the prisoner was waiting to be seen by a judge in June 2012. [See: PLN, March 2014, p.56]. McIntyre pleaded guilty, and was sentenced on February 14, 2014 to three years in prison with all but one year suspended. He also must serve 18 months of post-release probation.

Mexico: A statement released by Mexican authorities on January 3, 2014 detailed a bloody attack at a prison in the southern state of Guerrero. According to the statement, prosecutors did not rule out participation by prison officials in the incident, in which six men talked their way into the facility and then attacked a group of prisoners. A shootout with guards followed; four prisoners died, as well as five of the gunmen. The sixth attacker and a guard were injured during the shootout. Collusion with gang members by prison staff is common in Mexico's prison system.

Mississippi: In response to a riot at the Walnut Grove Correctional Facility on December 31, 2013, officials with Management and Training Corporation (MTC), the private company that runs the facility, issued a boilerplate statement that confirmed the incident but offered few details. Sources reported that over a dozen people were taken to local hospitals with injuries resulting from the disturbance, which appeared to be gang-related. One guard was reportedly injured and the facility placed on lockdown pending an investigation; six guards and a supervisor resigned or were fired following the incident. Nine prisoners were injured in another brawl at the MTC-operated facility on July 11, 2014, resulting in another lockdown.

Montana: A Mineral County juvenile probation officer was one of seven suspects arrested in a sting operation that targeted men who responded to Internet posts offering sexual favors from a fictitious 12-year-old girl. James Stewart Myers was taken into custody on December 18, 2013 after paying $100 to an undercover officer as he arrived at the address provided in connection with the sting. He was released from the Missoula County jail on $50,000 bail, then found dead in his home on January 13, 2014. His death was ruled a suicide.

New Hampshire: On December 19, 2013, eight prisoners at the Strafford County jail were charged with starting a riot. In October, they had refused to return to their cells and armed themselves with 2-by-4 boards and broom handles; officials declined to say what had caused the prisoners to rebel. Captain Robert Williams of the Strafford County Sheriff's Office told reporters that jail staff responded with "appropriate" force to quell the disturbance.

New Jersey: Former state prison guard Juan R. Stevens was sentenced to five years in prison on January 8, 2014 after pleading guilty to a charge of official misconduct. As previously reported in PLN, Stevens, 51, posed as a police officer and extorted sex from women who advertised online as escorts. He pretended he was conducting a prostitution sting and threatened the women with arrest if they did not comply with his sexual demands. [See: PLN, Sept. 2013, p.56]. DNA evidence linked Stevens to at least one of the assaults. "By abusing his badge to commit these abhorrent and offensive crimes, this correction officer proved that he has no business in our state prisons, except as a prisoner," said Acting Attorney General John Hoffman.

New York: State prisoner Orlando Taylor pleaded not responsible by reason of mental disease or defect on January 7, 2014 for his role in killing fellow prisoner Jeffery Johnson at the Green Haven Correctional Facility in December 2012, by beating Johnson with a 10-pound weight. Dutchess County Assistant District Attorney Frank Chase said Taylor showed no remorse for the killing and gave bizarre conspiracy theories as an explanation for murdering Johnson. Judge Peter M. Forman accepted the plea and ordered Taylor to undergo further psychiatric evaluation.

North Carolina: On December 12, 2013, a jury found Wake County jail guard Markeith Council guilty of involuntary manslaughter in the June 2013 beating death of prisoner Shon Demetrius McClain. Council was sentenced to 90 days in the jail where he had been employed, followed by 12 to 24 months of supervised probation. He had engaged in a fight with McClain after they exchanged words while Council was handing out bedsheets; McClain died 13 days later due to blunt force trauma to his head and neck.

Ohio: Former Lorain County jail guard Marlon Taylor pleaded guilty on January 14, 2014 to a single count of deprivation of rights under color of law. He was sentenced to 18 months in prison for assaulting prisoner Jordan Sand, 18. Investigators said Taylor repeatedly struck Sand and injured him in July 2012. [See: PLN, Jan. 2013, p.50].

Pennsylvania: On November 15, 2013, an incensed Allegheny County Common Pleas trial judge, Lester G. Nauhaus, ordered a stay of the sentence he had imposed on former state Supreme Court Justice Joan Orie Melvin, after she attempted to collect credit for time served while a portion of her sentence was on appeal. Orie Melvin's defense attorneys successfully argued to the state Superior Court that the sentence imposed by Nauhaus violated Orie Melvin's right against self-incrimination while she appealed her conviction. Nauhaus had ordered Orie Melvin to send photos of herself in handcuffs to judges throughout the state, along with a written apology for her corruption conviction. The former judge and her sister, Janine Orie, were found guilty of using judicial and legislative staff to run Orie Melvin's 2003 and 2009 election campaigns. On August 21, 2014, the Superior Court upheld other aspects of Orie Melvin's sentence, including three years of house arrest, volunteer work and a $55,000 fine. She also must write letters of apology to other Pennsylvania jurists, but no photos are required.

South Carolina: Former Tyger River Correctional Institution guard Jeffrey Scott Miller pleaded guilty to multiple burglary and larceny charges, as well as misconduct in office, on January 13, 2014. Several prisoners had accused Miller of providing them with impressions of jail master keys. Upon his arrest following that investigation, his booking fingerprints were matched to evidence collected from two 2008 home burglaries. He told Circuit Court Judge Mark Hayes that he realized he had done wrong and was sorry for his actions. Miller was sentenced to 10 years in prison on July 7, 2014, suspended to time served and four years of supervised probation.

Tennessee: Washington County Sheriff Ed Graybeal announced on October 15, 2013 that a tip had led to the discovery of contraband in the "pelvic region" of a prisoner reporting to the jail to serve 15 days on a previous conviction. A preliminary search found that Tasha Nicole Hale had no contraband, but a subsequent X-ray revealed a package inside her body. Hale now faces additional charges after refusing requests from deputies and medical personnel to remove the package of drugs, tobacco and chewing gum from her body cavity. It was unreported as to how the package was ultimately removed.

Texas: Jail guard Patrick Fitzgerald Perkins, 27, accepted a plea deal for his role in a scheme to smuggle a cell phone and drugs into the Harris County jail. On December 9, 2013, he pleaded guilty to felony drug possession and contraband charges in exchange for a lenient six-month jail term and five years' probation. The felony conviction nullifies Perkins' law enforcement certification and he will never be licensed as a jailer or allowed to work in law enforcement again. Perkins' misconduct was uncovered after prisoners identified him as the provider of a contraband cell phone. In a sting operation, a confidential informant inside the jail agreed to accept smuggled drugs from Perkins, who was found with the drugs in his possession prior to delivering them.

Texas: On December 3, 2013, Texas carried out yet another state-sanctioned homicide when 43-year-old Jerry Martin was executed for killing a prison guard during a brief escape in 2007. Martin had been serving a 50-year sentence for attempted capital murder when he and another prisoner fled from a work assignment. Susan Canfield, a 59-year-old guard, was on horseback and suffered fatal head injuries in the chaos and gunfire that ensued during the escape attempt. [See: PLN, Feb. 2010, p.50; April 2008, p.16]. Martin had requested an end to his court appeals, clearing the way for his execution by lethal injection.

Texas: Justin MacDonald was sentenced on October 15, 2013 to three years in prison after escaping from the Dallas County jail because he wanted to smoke a cigarette while serving time on a probation violation. In July 2013, MacDonald walked away from the facility through several open doors in search of a nicotine fix. He was spotted outside wearing jail-issued clothing and quickly apprehended. Officials did not indicate whether MacDonald actually got to smoke a cigarette during his brief escape.

United Kingdom: Two prisoners on their way to court escaped from a prison van in a raid at gunpoint, and a lawyer's clerk was charged for her part in planning the dramatic breakout. Legal worker Sarah McCabe sent multiple texts to a contraband cell phone just days before prisoners Ryan MacDonald and Steve McMullen escaped from custody. She later admitted her involvement, and was sentenced to six months in jail on November 1, 2013.

Utah: Steven Garrett Thayer, a Washington County jail guard, was fired on October 15, 2013 after being charged with seven misdemeanor counts and one felony count of custodial sexual misconduct and sexual relations with a prisoner at the Purgatory Correctional Facility. A spokesman for the Washington County Sheriff's Office said the department feels "very badly" when an employee violates the public's trust. Two other former Purgatory guards pleaded guilty in 2006 to having sex with prisoners at the jail.

Washington: In a dramatic conclusion to the "Cookie for Nookie" scandal at the Snohomish County jail [see: PLN, Aug. 2013, p.56], former jail guard Abner Canda, 59, was acquitted of charges related to allegations that he had traded chocolate chip cookies and other food items for sex acts with a female prisoner. Defense attorney Mark Mestel was able to discredit the police investigation that led to the charges; the jury needed only two hours to return a verdict of acquittal on December 20, 2013. According to Mestel, detectives could not prove that Canda was even working on the days the prisoner claimed the sexual acts occurred. They also failed to either corroborate or refute the woman's claims by interviewing possible witnesses to the alleged incidents. The acquittal is not expected to change the sheriff's office's decision to fire Canda, as his termination had resulted from a separate internal investigation.

West Virginia: Former prison guard Amy M. Jones, 36, was fired from her job at the Pruntytown Correctional Center and subsequently pleaded guilty to charges of sexual intercourse with an incarcerated person. She was sentenced on October 16, 2013 to three years of probation and will be required to register as a sex offender for 10 years. Both the prosecutor and defense counsel recommended a downward departure from a prison term of one-to-five years, because Jones had no prior criminal history.

Wisconsin: A contracted alcohol and drug counselor at the Jackson Correctional Institution was charged on January 9, 2014 with smuggling at least two cell phones into the facility in exchange for bribes. Karen Robertson, 52, admitted to smuggling the phones and was charged with two felony counts of delivering illegal articles to prisoners. Following her arrest, Robertson was freed on a $5,000 signature bond.

Zimbabwe: Zimbabwe Lawyers for Human Rights, an advocacy organization, said in a statement released on December 3, 2013 that more than 100 prisoners had died in 2013 due to food shortages caused by lack of funding. The Zimbabwean prison system requires about $1.2 million to provide food rations for nearly 18,500 prisoners, but only received around $300,000. During the height of Zimbabwe's economic crisis in 2009, the International Committee of the Red Cross distributed food, blankets and soap to prisoners in an attempt to stave off hunger and disease outbreaks, yet more than half of the nation's prison population died of starvation. ■

States Renewing Their Prison Phone Contracts

As state DOCs renew or rebid their prison phone contracts, you can help urge them to lower intrastate phone rates and eliminate commission kickbacks!

The Campaign for Prison Phone Justice needs your help in:

**** Arizona, Iowa, North Dakota ******

The Departments of Corrections in the above states are in the process of re-bidding or renewing their prison phone contracts. Most DOCs receive a commission (kickback) on revenue generated from calls made by prisoners, which results in excessively high phone rates. Although the FCC voted last year to cap the costs of interstate (long distance) prison calls, which went into effect on February 11, 2014, the order does not apply to intrastate (in-state) calls. An estimated 85% of prison phone calls are in-state. This is an opportunity to ask DOCs to forgo commissions and ensure their new prison phone contracts are based on the lowest cost to those who pay for the calls – mostly prisoners' families.

Take Action NOW! Here's What YOU Can Do!

Ask your family members and friends to write, email, call and fax the DOC and the governor's office (addresses and contacts are listed below), requesting that the DOC: 1) forgo commission payments when re-bidding or renewing its prison phone contract, and 2) base the new contract on the lowest calling costs. Lower prison phone rates should apply not just to long distance calls but also to in-state calls. For a sample letter or to easily send an email, visit the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice's website and click on the "Take Action" tab:

In Washington State Prisons, Negligent Health Care Turns Illness into a Death Sentence

by Rick Anderson

RICARDO CRUZ MEJIA'S FINAL DAYS began with a stomach problem. It was October 2010. After the 26-year-old Walla Walla State Penitentiary prisoner discovered blood in his stool, he signed in at the prison infirmary. A test and exam turned up a severely inflamed colon. The onetime Latino gang member from Skagit County, doing 34 years for seven felonies including murder, was given hydrocortisone enemas and tabs of prednisone, used to treat inflammation. The prison medical staff also gave him sulfasalazine for abdominal pain.

In November, Mejia, a stocky, tattooed prisoner with a closely shaved head, began to experience other symptoms – headaches, sore throat, then vomiting. He also had begun to develop a rash, for which he was given penicillin, though it didn't seem to help.

In the ensuing days, he became a familiar figure to infirmary nurses. From December through the first week of January 2011, he showed up at the infirmary 14 times. Nurses doled out a topical corticosteroid for skin inflammation and tried other drugs to ease his symptoms. Still, none alleviated the persistent, painful irritations and stomach problems.

On January 10, 2011, he arrived to tell medical staffers his sore throat was killing him – “It hurts to breathe,” he said, according to notes in his medical record. Staffers seemed stumped. His vital signs weren't taken and no new treatment was offered.

Mejia returned the next day and announced he was having what he called “a medical emergency.” In addition to his earlier symptoms, he had developed fever blisters, sore joints and rectal pain. His pulse was racing, his blood pressure rising. He had been unable to eat for three days, he said.

Prison physician Barry Kellog, who examined him, did not find Mejia in any acute distress and prescribed more prednisone and sulfasalazine. He'd later recall he saw Mejia only briefly, and was not informed by the nurse who was assisting him and had treated Mejia earlier that the patient turned out to be allergic to sulfasalazine. Nor did she tell him, Kellog recalled, that Mejia had a rash and had been diagnosed with colitis, an inflamed colon.

On January 13, 2011 at 8 a.m., Mejia was back complaining of similar problems, and a new one – blisters on his anus. He was examined and given an oral antifungal.

The next day, Mejia returned – this time with painful mouth and rectal ulcers and severe abdominal pain. He'd been unable to have a bowel movement for four days, he said. He was given hydrocortisone, milk of magnesia and an anesthetic. A nurse provided moistened gauzes to place on the painful skin ulcers.

Nurse Allison Oleson would later say that it was clear Mejia was “quite sick” that day. “When this kid came into the exam room, he was clearly in distress.” She said she called on Kenneth Moore, a physician's assistant, to take a look at Mejia. (Known as PAs, the assistants are not accredited doctors but practice medicine on a team under the supervision of physicians and surgeons; typically they are formally educated to diagnose illness or injury and provide general treatment).

But Moore, like the earlier doctor, did not examine Mejia, Oleson recalled. He didn't even see him. During a phone chat with the nurse, he ordered Lidocaine, a topical pain-numbing gel.

Mejia returned to his cell. But his symptoms grew worse. At 4:30 the next morning, January 15, a medical staffer who visited Mejia in his cell undertook a brief examination and told him to come into the infirmary a few hours later.

When the prisoner showed up at 7:30 a.m., he was seated uncomfortably in a wheelchair. He was unable to sit and was experiencing diarrhea. His pulse, temperature and blood pressure were all rising and

TAKE ACTION ON PRISON PHONE RATES – CONTACT THE FCC NOW!

After nearly a decade, the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) took action in 2013 and issued an order, effective February 11, 2014, that capped the cost of interstate (long distance) prison phone rates. This led to an almost 80% decrease in interstate phone costs in some states, and those costs are now capped at $.25/minute for collect calls and $.21/minute for debit and prepaid calls. On September 25, 2014, the FCC indicated that it plans to take further action to reduce prison phone rates, including in-state (intrastate) rates – which still remain high in many jurisdictions. In fact, in-state phone rates are now higher than long distance rates in many cases.

You can submit a public comment to the FCC; even if you have sent comments before, you can resubmit them or submit new information. Please write to the FCC as soon as possible, addressing any of the following topics:

- Positive Impact of the FCC Order Reducing Interstate Calls: Let the FCC know how the rate caps on interstate prison phone calls have resulted in lower costs or helped you and your family!
- Negative Impact of Intrastate Phone Calls: While the FCC capped long distance phone rates, the order did not apply to in-state calls, which make up 85% of all calls from prisons and jails. How much do you or your family pay for in-state phone calls? The FCC needs to hear about this issue so they know why intrastate prison phone rates need to be reduced, too.
- Ancillary Fees: Do you or your family have to pay extra fees (ancillary fees) to make or accept calls, such as fees to set up, add money to or cancel a prepaid or debit prison phone account? Are you charged fees but were not told about them before they were charged? How much are these fees? Have they increased?
- Importance of Prison Phone Reforms: Tell the FCC why it is important to enact permanent reform of prison phone rates for interstate and in-state calls, including rate caps and the elimination of “commission” payments to corrections agencies. Also, the FCC needs details about fee-based video visitation services.

his buttocks were red with blisters.

At 8:45, Moore, the PA, agreed to examine him. But he initially decided not to admit Mejia to the prison's inpatient unit. Pressed by nurse Vickie Holevinski, who recognized signs of sepsis – indicating Mejia was suffering from widespread infection with a threat of multiple organ failure – Moore relented.

Mejia was treated with antibiotics and given whirlpool baths. Still, two and a half hours into treatment, he was breathing rapidly and his blood pressure had plunged while his heart continued to race. He had skin excoriations over much of his body, particularly down his legs and around his buttocks. In some places, his skin had broken open, turned purple and was draining. He was dizzy and in pain, he told nurses, and suffering from shortness of breath.

Faced with clear indications Mejia was in danger, PA Moore decided he needed to go to an outside hospital. At 1 p.m. on January 15, 2011, an ambulance ferried Ricardo Mejia downtown to Walla Walla's Providence St. Mary Medical Center. It would be his last day in prison. And his last full day of life.

St. Mary doctors, finding a severely ill man in their emergency room, began running tests. Within a short time, they concluded Mejia, now in shock, needed specialized emergency care they were not equipped to deliver. He was a stretcher-ful of ailments, including perianal cellulitis, proctitis, sepsis and ulcerative colitis. Most crucial, doctors discovered necrotizing bilateral tonsillitis. A flesh-eating disease had set in.

Doctors alerted the state medical airlift service, and Mejia was hurried to Walla Walla Regional Airport and put aboard a small plane. By 6 p.m. he was in the air, flying over the prison, headed to Providence Sacred Heart Medical Center in Spokane, one of the region's biggest hospitals and specialty-care centers.

Alerted in advance, Sacred Heart doctors were ready when Mejia was wheeled in. He was immediately prepared for surgery, and doctors realized they'd have to cut away infected sections of his body. He had Fournier's gangrene, a critical infection of the genitalia. Capable of developing quickly, within hours, it causes severe pain in the penis and scrotum and progresses from a spreading redness to necrosis – the death of tissue.

That and contributing conditions were also causing Mejia's kidneys to shut down. The medical team had no alternatives in surgery, and began removing his rectum and large portions of his buttocks.

It was a long, challenging debriding of the infected areas. And it came too late. At 2:02 the next morning, January 16, 2011, state prisoner Ricardo Mejia – a patient who'd been denied admittance to the prison infirmary 16 hours earlier – was pronounced dead.

Mejia's death didn't make the news. But it mattered to his family, at least, including his two children by separate mothers in Skagit County, and his surrogate mom, as April Soria calls herself. A counselor in a Skagit work-training program, Soria first met Mejia – whom she calls "Richard" – when he was a teen in trouble. Born a U.S. citizen, Mejia was abandoned by his birth mom when he was young and raised by others, spending much of his time on the streets. Young Mejia came to confide in Soria, and the two struck up a familial relationship. As his designated outside prison contact, she was first to get the bad-news phone call from Spokane early on the morning he died.

"It was the hospital chaplain," Soria recalls. "At first I didn't know he was saying Richard had died. I couldn't understand what this thing was that had happened. Then he said – I can't forget the words – 'This is the worst case of medical negligence we've ever seen.'"

But, as Soria would find out, it happened within a system not prone to publicize its mistakes or generate public sympathy for its prisoners. After all, Mejia, a onetime street gangster known as Li'l Jokes, entered prison with 17 felonies on his record. He'd already done a two-year prison stretch for discharging a weapon in public during a Mount Vernon gang dispute in 2005. In 2009, he was returned to custody, this time sent to the hard-time Walls for a string of crimes including the murder of an elderly woman.

In September 2007, Mejia, then 23, of Sedro-Woolley, was sought for burglary, assault, car theft and eluding deputies. With two female accomplices, he was looting a home outside Burlington when the homeowner walked in. The three fled in a car and eluded police in a mad chase, hitting speeds of up to 90 mph and crashing the car in a cornfield. The women were nabbed but Mejia got away, running to a nearby home.

There he encountered an 84-year-old woman named Clara Thorp and demanded her car keys. She had no car. An enraged Mejia pushed the frail lady to the floor and ran to a second home nearby, where he was able to commandeer a car and escape. Officers found that car crashed in west Mount Vernon, but Mejia was gone again. Two days later, attempting to break into a vehicle in Mount Vernon, he was spotted by an officer. After a standoff in which Mejia climbed a structure and resisted arrest – he was Tased six times in a struggle – police took him into custody.

Three months later, the elderly woman died. Clara Thorp had been on the floor, undiscovered, for more than an hour, and was hospitalized with a broken pelvis. A few days later she also suffered a heart attack. She ended up disabled, living in a senior care center, turning 85, and never regaining her health. On January 11, 2008 she died from pneumonia stemming from her injuries, the medical examiner ruled, labeling the death a homicide. By law, a death that occurs during the commission of a felony can be charged as a murder. Skagit prosecutors refiled 14 felony charges altogether against Mejia, including first-degree murder, accusing him of exhibiting “deliberate cruelty” in his attack on the defenseless Thorp.

Mejia, who faced the possibility of life in prison, mulled over his chances as the case dragged out for a year. Soria, his adopted mom, says “I told him, ‘You have to plead guilty.’ He didn’t intend to kill her. But he had to take responsibility for what happened.” Mejia agreed to a plea bargain. The case was winnowed down to seven felonies and the murder charge dropped to second-degree.

In June 2009, Mejia was sentenced to 34 years. “For a 24-year-old man, this criminal record could be the biggest one I’ve ever seen,” said Skagit County Superior Court Judge John Meyer, according to a report in the Skagit Valley Herald. Clara Thorp’s son, granddaughter and great-grandson were in the courtroom and read a statement about Thorp’s assault and death, recalling the agony of having “watched her go through so much pain she didn’t deserve.”

Mejia, contrite, apologized for his life of crime, drugs and gang-banging. “I know I’m a monster,” he told Thorp’s family. “I know you guys hate me. I hate myself for the things I’ve done.” Says mom Soria: “There was never a minute, from the day of her death to the day of his death, that he wasn’t sorry for what he did.”

As a career criminal, Mejia wasn’t a likely candidate to change his life by doing another prison stretch. Still, he had hope: If he’d completed his full term and been released, he’d have been 58. At least he wasn’t a lifer, nor had he been condemned to death.

Not officially, anyway. As it turned out, Mejia, like his victim, went through pain he didn’t deserve, serving a capital sentence he wasn’t given. Unlike Clara Thorp’s, however, no one would be punished for his death.

An autopsy ordered by the state determined Ricardo Mejia died of blood poisoning and septic shock resulting from the flesh-eating disease and rectal infection. The death raised concerns at the state Department of Health, and inspectors began perusing prison medical records and asking questions.

In a May 2011 report, the department found the prison had failed to provide “a formalized process for continuity of care and supervision.” Medical staff was not prepared, and supervisors were missing in action. There was only informal oversight of mid-level care providers, such as physician’s assistants, and a lack of case discussion between line staff and the prison’s medical director, Dr. James Edwards.

In Mejia’s case, nurses had repeatedly failed to obtain his vital signs or contact the on-call doctor or PA when those signs were out of whack – and even then there was a lack of urgent response, investigators found. On January 15, 2011, the day Mejia ended up being rushed to the hospital, the nurse visiting his cell that early morning recorded his heart rate at 154 – and merely made an appointment for him to see a doctor three hours later. Help should have come immediately.

To critics of the prison medical-care system, the Mejia case sounded eerily familiar. In 2004, Charles Manning, a prisoner at Stafford Creek Correctional Center outside Aberdeen, was diagnosed as having an allergenic reaction to Robitussin, the cold medicine. He endured two days of pain in the prison infirmary, treated with an ice pack and medications. He was then belatedly diagnosed with an infection and transferred to Grays Harbor Community Hospital. There, emergency doctors determined – much as the Walla Walla and Spokane doctors did in Mejia’s case – that Manning had Fournier’s gangrene.

To save his life, the Aberdeen doctors removed his genitals and pounds of flesh. Unlike Mejia, Manning survived. But he was left disfigured and disabled. As Prison Legal News put it in a report, “Charlie Manning, doing 13 months after a drunken argument with a neighbor, left prison with no penis.” [See: PLN, June 2008, p.20].

Such cases are costly not only to the victims but to taxpayers – Manning, for example, later sued for damages, accepting a $300,000 settlement from the state in 2008. (In one of the most costly state cases, Gertrude Barrow, 41, died at the Washington Corrections Center for Women in Purdy of a perforated chronic peptic ulcer and acute peritonitis. In 1994, her family was awarded $630,000 due to state negligence).

“Prison doctors are not necessarily going to be the best practitioners available,” Paul Wright says in a purposeful understatement. “The state DOC has a long history of employing doctors with disciplinary histories and not sanctioning them even when they kill, and keeping them on the payroll.”

And Wright would know. Some of those doctors treated him. Wright was a state prisoner for 17 years, convicted of the murder of a drug dealer. Among those who tended him was a dentist named Joel Driven. In one example of his care, according to state investigators, the 72-year-old dentist wrenched out part of a McNeil Island prisoner’s jawbone rather than the tooth he intended to pull. That tore open the roof of the prisoner’s mouth, causing Driven to panic as the prisoner faced the likelihood of bleeding to death. A second dentist also froze, as did a dental assistant. Another assistant saved the day, taking over Driven’s patient, shouting commands to the doctor and calling for emergency aid. She told investigators that what she’d witnessed was “torture ... barbaric.” In 2007, Driven was let go and his license revoked.

Wright, who served his time and went on to found Prison Legal News and campaign for prisoner rights, says the 10-year-old Manning case should have been a turning point for corrections medical reform. But “Whatever they did [after that settlement], if they did anything, obviously didn’t help Ricardo Mejia.”

Wright’s umbrella organization, the Human Rights Defense Center of Lake Worth, Florida, got interested in Mejia’s case. Started on a $50 budget with an all-volunteer grassroots base, the center has today become a 501(c)(3) organization with 13 full-time employees including two staff attorneys. It specializes in litigation and advocacy for prisoners.

“Manning was crippled and Mejia killed because of the sheer neglect and ineptitude of DOC medical staff,” Wright says. “This is an ongoing story with the state DOC.”

It was a story that Mejia’s mom, Soria,

wasn't getting in full, she says. "It was so difficult to get at the truth. The state wouldn't provide public records. One state records clerk I got to know said, off the record to me, 'This isn't normal. These records should be available. You need to get an attorney.'" She did.

In April last year, Wright's defense center filed a legal tort claim for damages against the state for the medical failures leading to Mejia's death. It was brought on behalf of Soria and Mejia's two children, ages 12 and 7. Jesse Wing, the lead attorney in the claim, from the Seattle law firm of MacDonald Hoague & Bayless, says "Mr. Mejia's case illustrates something worse than inadequate care. He suffered not just incompetent care, but obvious indifference to his serious pain and illness. This 'I don't care if you live or die' attitude is at odds with the most basic duty of a health-care provider and of the Hippocratic oath."

The claim focused particularly on the role of Moore, the physician's assistant who'd been reluctant to admit Mejia as an inpatient. Prison medical director Edwards told state investigators that Moore "tends not to listen to nurses ... [he] irritates and frustrates" them. Pat Rima, the prison's former health-care administrator, said Moore was "at times ... on the edge with his care decisions," and that at one point she opted not to renew his then-part-time contract. But after Rima moved on to another job, her replacement rehired Moore, with Edwards' approval, full-time.

One nurse recalled that on the day Mejia would eventually be rushed to an outside hospital, she had repeatedly beseeched Moore to admit him as an inpatient. Mejia had arrived in a wheelchair in great pain, his heart racing. Another nurse said Mejia was so obviously septic he "could go south in a hurry," yet "Mr. Moore was sitting there, allowing the patient to wait 45 minutes while no treatment orders or medication was given."

About the time the claim was filed, the state Medical Quality Assurance Commission – responding to a separate complaint filed by Wright's group – lodged charges against Moore, claiming his care may have constituted medical "incompetence, negligence, or malpractice." He failed to recognize a life-threatening condition, the commission said, and lacked concern when urgency was called for.

Moore didn't take much time to settle the complaint. And why not? His penalty was to write a paper about his error. In what it calls an informal disposition, the commission ordered Moore to study up on sepsis, colitis and necrotizing fasciitis, then compose 1,000 words on those topics. He'd also have to make a class-like presentation to others on the prison medical team, and would have to reimburse the commission for costs, $750. "It was a slap on the wrist," says Mejia attorney Wing.

In January of this year the charges against Moore were formally withdrawn, although he still must comply with the writing and educational stipulations of the disposition.

That same month, having received no answer to the claim filed against the state, Wright's group went to court and formally filed a lawsuit against the Department of Corrections on behalf of Mejia's estate. In the suit, attorneys alleged that Mejia "died a horrible and painful death at age 26 ... [his] medical providers ignored obvious signs of infection and serious medical illness, and he literally rotted to death." Timely diagnoses and treatment would have spared his life and the pain he suffered, the suit claimed, citing mistakes turned up by the Health Department probe.

Four months later, in April 2014, the DOC agreed to settle. [See related article in this issue of PLN, p.8].

The department conceded some responsibility for Mejia's painful death. It agreed to pay $740,000 to his family, likely a record amount in such a case. The department also said it had made some changes in its prison medical operations to comply with the Health Department's findings, including assigning prisoners to doctors, expanding dialogue between staff and supervisors, and informing staff in more detail about flesh-eating bacteria. But the state admitted no legal wrongdoing in Mejia's death.

Nonetheless, as in the earlier flesh-eating case, it was a costly mistake in life and money that could have been avoided, says Paul Wright. "The common theme here is the DOC botched the diagnoses until it was too late – and remember, these are deep-tissue bacteria that take at least a week to develop to the killer phase, and as soon as these men were taken to a hospital, the ER doctors diagnosed them almost immediately.

"I think the most compelling story is the bigger issue of inadequate medical care," Wright says. "The DOC spends over $100 million a year on [care] and prisoners still die gruesome deaths from easily diagnosed illnesses."

Wright says his organization expects to bring other suits in the future. Unfortunately, he says, there will be a need for them.

As for April Soria, she didn't share in the settlement. "She is just a very good person who tried to help him and his family," says attorney Wing, "so the settlement money went to his children."

In June 2014, Moore showed up at a medical commission hearing to see how he had complied with settlement stipulations. Wing, who also attended, said "a state lawyer told us afterwards that a purpose of the hearing was for the board to see Mr. Moore's demeanor when discussing care of patients. We pointed out that Mr. Moore's demeanor did not seem appropriate under the circumstances. He did not show any sense of responsibility for the death of Mr. Mejia or even that he was discussing the death of a human being at the hearing."

But apparently Moore received the state's blessings. He remains a practicing, full-time PA at the state pen. ■

$750,000 Settlement for Washington State Prisoner's Wrongful Death

by Carrie Wilkinson

ALTHOUGH PRISON LEGAL NEWS AND its parent organization, the Human Rights Defense Center (HRDC), are best known for litigation involving censorship by prison and jail officials, HRDC also co-counsels select other cases, mainly involving wrongful deaths on behalf of prisoners' surviving family members.

As detailed in this issue's cover story, one of those cases involved Washington state prisoner Ricardo Cruz Mejia, who died after an untreated infection turned deadly. The medical examiner listed his cause of death as necrotizing fasciitis/Fournier's gangrene, sepsis and septic shock.

Mejia's preventable death was a case of history repeating itself. In 2004, Washington prisoner Charles Manning was initially diagnosed as having a reaction to Robitussin. Hospital staff subsequently found he had Fournier's gangrene, and his genitals were amputated to save his life. Manning survived and filed suit, settling with the state for $300,000 in 2008. [See: PLN, June 2008, p.20].

Ricardo Mejia was diagnosed with ulcerative colitis in October 2010 while incarcerated at the Washington State Penitentiary in Walla Walla, and prison medical staff prescribed medication to treat his condition. His symptoms included gastrointestinal problems and blood in his stool.

He was seen by medical staff 14 times in the 48 days before he died, and not only reported the treatments were not working but that his symptoms were becoming progressively worse – including headaches, a sore throat, skin rashes, pain and vomiting.

As with Manning, the initial treatment prescribed for Mejia did not remedy his symptoms and DOC medical staff failed to take further action until it was too late and his condition escalated into Fournier's gangrene. Mejia died of the same infection under the care of the same prison medical system that had almost killed Manning seven years earlier.

A DOC incident report prepared by Dr. David Kenney seven months after Mejia's death noted that "the drugs he received to control his symptoms (steroid enemas, aminosalicylates and oral steroids) may not have completely controlled his disease," and that "an ongoing evaluation of his response to these medications was not recorded."

Following an initial tort claim, a complaint was filed in Thurston County Superior Court on December 20, 2013 on behalf of Mejia's estate and his two minor children, alleging that DOC medical staff had "ignored obvious signs of infection and serious illness and he literally rotted to death under their care through negligence and deliberate indifference."

According to the complaint, Mejia's symptoms worsened in January 2011, and on January 14 he sought medical care for mouth and rectal ulcers; a nurse noted he had not had a bowel movement in four days, and his rectum "showed a large, excoriated, blistered area." Physician assistant Kenneth Moore refused to see Mejia or admit him to the prison's inpatient unit, but only ordered Lido-caine for pain over the phone. Moore later agreed to admit Mejia for inpatient care after a nurse voiced concerns.

Following worsening symptoms, Mejia was finally transported to an outside hospital on January 15, 2011, where surgeons "cut away large portions of his buttock and rectum" in a last-ditch effort to save his life. They were unsuccessful and he "died a horrible, grotesque, and painful death, at age 26."

The lawsuit claimed that Washington DOC medical staff had violated standards of patient care by failing to provide adequate treatment to Mejia in spite of his obvious, serious symptoms. The complaint noted that recognizing those symptoms "required only basic health care skills and knowledge; it is 'Medicine 101.'"

The Washington Department of Health conducted an investigation into Mejia's death and found that prison medical staff "did not provide a formalized process for continuity of care and supervision of care," which "may result in inappropriate and unsafe care." Further, the investigation determined that "the facility did not have a formalized process for midlevel providers to discuss complex medical cases with the medical director and did not have [a] formalized process to refer complex cases from the midlevel provider to the medical director."

Dr. Kenney's review recommended ten improvements for DOC medical staff, including a review and assessment of the primary care system "to optimize comprehensive assessment and management of medical conditions, [to] ensure that continuity of that care is maintained and [staff] be accountable for oversight of all care delivered."

Four months after the lawsuit was filed, which named the Washington DOC and six DOC medical practitioners – including Moore – as defendants, the case settled in March 2014 for $750,000. Mejia's estate was represented by the Human Rights Defense Center and Seattle attorney Jesse Wing with MacDonald Hoague & Bayless. See: Soria v. Washington DOC, Thurston County Superior Court (WA), Case No. 13-2-02598-9. ■

Texas Court Finds CCA Subject to State's Public Information Act, Awards Attorney Fees

ON SEPTEMBER 15, 2014, A TRAVIS County District Court entered a final judgment that found Corrections Corporation of America (CCA), the nation's largest for-profit prison company, is a "governmental body" for purposes of the Texas Public Information Act and is therefore subject to the "Act's obligations to disclose public information."

This was the first time a Texas court had held that a private prison company was required to comply with the state's public records law, joining decisions by courts in Tennessee, Florida and Vermont. [See: PLN, July 2013, p.42; June 2013, p.14; June 2010, p.29].

Travis County District Court Judge Gisela D. Triana entered the judgment in a lawsuit brought against CCA by Prison Legal News.

PLN filed suit on May 1, 2013 after the company refused to produce records related to the now-closed Dawson State Jail, including reports and audits concerning CCA's management of the facility. [See: PLN, June 2013, p.46]. CCA operates nine facilities in Texas, including four state jails.

PLN had argued that CCA meets the definition of a "governmental body" under the Texas Public Information Act because – among other factors – the company "shares a common purpose and objective to that of the government" and performs services "traditionally performed by governmental bodies."

In the latter regard, PLN noted that "Incarceration is inherently a power of government. By using public money to perform a public function, CCA is a governmental body for purposes" of the state's public records law.

The court agreed, noting that "CCA failed and refused to disclose the documents" requested by PLN, which were "public information" as defined by state law. Accordingly, CCA was ordered to produce the records; Judge Triana also ordered the company to pay $25,000 in PLN's attorneys' fees and costs, plus another $5,000 if it unsuccessfully appeals.

"That is the right result and clearly what the Public Information Act requires," stated Cindy Saiter, one of PLN's attorneys.

CCA has vigorously opposed compliance with state public records laws and has lobbied against the Private Prison Information Act on the federal level. [See: PLN, Feb. 2013, p.14].

"Although CCA acts as the functional equivalent of a government agency when it runs prisons and jails, it opposes efforts to hold the company accountable under public records laws to the same extent as government agencies," said PLN editor Paul Wright. "It makes you wonder what the company is hiding, and why it doesn't want to be held accountable to members of the public whose tax dollars pay for CCA's private prison contracts."

"The public saw truly awful things when we began pulling the veil from the CCAoperated Dawson State Jail last year," added attorney Brian McGiverin with the Texas Civil Rights Project. "Today, allegations are coming to light of CCA's complicity in a widespread sexual abuse hazing ritual at the Bartlett State Jail. Is it any wonder CCA opposes greater transparency?"

PLN was represented by attorneys Cindy Saiter with Scott, Douglass & McConnico, LLP and Brian McGiverin with the Texas Civil Rights Project. The case is Prison Legal News v. CCA, Travis County District Court, 353rd Judicial District, Cause No. D-1-GN-13-001445.

The hazing ritual mentioned by McGiverin involves allegations in a federal lawsuit that claims prisoners at the Bartlett State Jail were stripped by other prisoners, turned upside down and had their naked buttocks slammed against the window of a guard station – known as "ass on the glass." A prisoner subjected to the hazing said he was sexually assaulted during the incident, and that there was only one CCA guard in the unit, who did nothing to stop it.

The October 2013 "ass on the glass" incident reportedly lasted two hours and involved 55 prisoners. The lawsuit, filed in September 2014, remains pending. See: Doe v. CCA, U.S.D.C. (W.D. Texas), Case No. 1:14-cv-00840. ■

by Paul Wright

THIS MONTH'S COVER STORY ABOUT the Washington Department of Corrections killing prisoner Ricardo Mejia through medical neglect is in many ways an old one. Over the past 24 years, PLN has run hundreds of articles about prisons and jails murdering prisoners through medical and mental health neglect, malpractice and deliberate indifference.

What is different about this story is that attorneys from the Human Rights Defense Center – the organization that publishes Prison Legal News – represented Mr. Mejia's family and estate in obtaining some modicum of justice following his death, with the goal of trying to ensure it does not happen to other prisoners.

When PLN was founded in 1990, one of our goals was to be able to conduct public interest litigation involving the criminal justice system. Between 1993 and 2009, PLN filed a number of censorship and public records lawsuits around the country, many involving cutting-edge legal issues, which helped to ensure that the right of prisoners and publishers to send and receive information was respected, and brought a modest amount of transparency to the secrecy of government institutions.

In 2009 we created our litigation project, which allowed us to employ our first staff attorney to represent PLN in censorship and public records litigation as well as represent others in matters related to HRDC's mission. Today, HRDC's litigation project employs two full-time attorneys including Lance Weber, our litigation director, plus two full-time paralegals.

To date, HRDC attorneys have successfully represented the estates of two prisoners in Tennessee who died due to medical neglect involving private prison companies, the estate of a Pennsylvania prisoner who died from a lack of mental health treatment and the family of a prisoner brutally murdered by other prisoners at a private prison in Arizona. Those cases were all resolved by confidential agreements, which have not allowed us to report the outcomes; several were resolved pre-litigation.

The case involving Mr. Mejia is not subject to a confidentiality provision and is fully reported in this issue of PLN. An upcoming issue will report the results of a lawsuit against Corrections Corporation of America, which HRDC resolved in favor of a former prisoner whose baby was born prematurely and died while she was held at a CCA-run jail.

Due to our very limited resources, HRDC's attorneys can only provide representation in a select number of cases; our current focus is on cases involving deaths, and as the cover story makes clear, where the facts of the case lend to larger public issues related to the need for prison reform. We would like to thank Mr. Mejia's family for choosing HRDC to represent them and also our co-counsel, Jesse Wing at MacDonald Hoague & Bayless (MHB) in Seattle. Carrie Wilkinson, the director of our Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign, also worked on the case while she was employed at MHB prior to joining HRDC.

We have a lot of exciting news this month. In addition to the resolution of Mr. Mejia's wrongful death suit, we are very happy to announce that we are publishing the Disciplinary Self-Help Litigation Manual by Dan Manville within the next few weeks. Since 2009, PLN has published two other books – the Prisoners' Guerrilla Handbook to Correspondence Courses in the U.S. and Canada (3rd ed.) and The Habeas Citebook: Ineffective Assistance of Counsel. Our goal is to continue to publish high quality self-help, non-fiction reference books which are of interest to prisoners and will help them help themselves.

We are proud to be publishing the second edition of the Disciplinary Self-Help Litigation Manual. Dan was HRDC's first staff attorney; we have published his articles for many years, and he has represented PLN in censorship litigation dating back to 1999. Every prisoner in America is subject to prison and jail disciplinary hearings and needs to know his or her rights in order to enforce them. The book is in the final stages of production and we anticipate it

Additionally, it is time for the annual PLN and HRDC fundraiser. We recently realized that many people, including long-time PLN subscribers, are not aware of the full scope of our activities on behalf of prisoners and their families. This year we are sending everyone a copy of our 2013 annual report and some news articles about PLN that provide a detailed overview of everything we do on an ongoing basis.

Our fundraising goal this year is $75,000 to help cover the costs of the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice. Thanks to the help of our readers and supporters, HRDC was able to play an integral leadership role in getting the Federal Communications Commission to cap the cost of interstate phone calls from prisons and jails. We are currently trying to get the FCC to extend those rate caps to the costs of intrastate (in-state) phone calls, which make up the majority of calls from detention facilities.

We incur extensive costs in obtaining the phone contracts, calling rates, ancillary fees and commission data that have underpinned the FCC campaign, and most importantly, everyone in the advocacy community has relied on our data. Travel expenses for testifying before the FCC, meeting with FCC commissioners and staff, etc. all add up, and we have a full-time staff member working on the campaign.

Donations are urgently needed to support our efforts; your financial help has made the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice possible, and we are close to achieving significant reforms beyond the interstate rate caps. If you and your family are tired of being gouged and ruthlessly exploited by prison telecom companies and the prisons and jails that take kickbacks in exchange for telephone monopolies, then please donate to HRDC so we can continue the fight.

This issue of PLN includes an ad describing how to contact the FCC about the high costs of in-state prison phone calls and the negative impact those costs have had on you and your family. Comments can be submitted in writing by prisoners and online by non-prisoners. This is the time to make your voice heard — please let others know about the need to contact the FCC and to donate to HRDC and PLN so we can maintain the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice!

Lastly, as the holidays approach, nothing makes for better gifts than a subscription to PLN and some of the books we distribute, plus you can still take advantage of our Subscription Madness offer (see the ad on page 25).

Enjoy this issue of PLN and please encourage others to subscribe.

Women in Solitary Confinement: “The Isolation Degenerates Us into Madness”

by Victoria Law

A MASS PRISONER HUNGER STRIKE rocked California's prison system last year, drawing international attention to the extensive use of solitary confinement in the United States. Increasingly, solitary is finding its way into the mainstream media and onto activist agendas. Nearly all of the attention, however, has focused on solitary confinement in men's prisons; much less is known about the conditions and experiences inside women's prisons.

During legislative hearing on solitary confinement in California in October 2013, lawmakers asked prison officials about women in solitary confinement. Officials from the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) stated that 74 women were held in the Security Housing Unit at the California Institution for Women (CIW) and a handful of women were awaiting transfer from the Central California Women's Facility (CCWF). CDCR does not separate people in the SHU with mental illness from those without mental illness. CDCR officials did not address the number of people in the Administrative Segregation (or Ad Seg) Unit.

According to CDCR statistics, as of September 2013, 107 women were held in Ad Seg at CCWF, which has a budgeted capacity of 38. The average stay was 131 days. Twenty women had been there longer than 200 days, two had exceeded 400 days and another two women had exceeded 800 days. At CIW, 34 women were in Ad Seg with an average stay of 73 days. Two women have exceeded 200 days.

Lawmakers' inquiry prompted advocacy group California Coalition for Women Prisoners to send an open letter to Assemblywoman Nancy Skinner requesting that she investigate conditions of solitary confinement in women's prisons. The group noted that, with the conversion of Valley State Prison for Women to a men's prison and the transfer of several hundred women to California's other two women's prisons, the use of solitary confinement has dramatically increased.

To justify the increase, CDCR has cited “enemy concerns” or a documented disagreement between people that may have led to threats or violence. Those designated as having “enemy concerns” are locked in their cells 22 to 24 hours a day and lose all privileges. CDCR reports do not separate the number of people in Ad Seg or the SHU for rules violations versus those confined because of “enemy concerns.” The California Coalition for Women Prisoners has noted that many of these “enemy concerns” are based on incidents that happened years ago and may not be valid today.

Dolores Canales has a son who has spent 13 years in Pelican Bay's SHU. Canales has also had firsthand experience with solitary confinement. While imprisoned at CIW, she spent nine months in Ad Seg, where she was confined to her cell 22 hours a day. “There, I had a window. The guards would take me out to the yard every day. I'd get to go out to the yard with other people,” she recalled.

But the isolation still took its toll: “There's an anxiety that overcomes you in the middle of the night because you're so locked in,” she described. Even after being released from segregation, Canales was unable to shake that anxiety. She broke into a sweat and panicked each time she saw a group of officers even though she had broken no rules. “I just can't forget,” she stated years after her release from prison.

Although the spotlight on solitary has focused largely on California, every women's prison has a solitary confinement unit. Florida's Lowell Correctional Institution for Women has a Closed Management Special Housing Unit (CM SHU) where women are confined to their cells 23 to 24 hours a day. “There is no free movement or social interaction,” reported one woman. “We just sit locked in a concrete and steel room the size of a small residential bathroom.”

In Indiana, Sarah Jo Pender has spent nearly five years in solitary. “My cell is approximately 68 square feet of concrete with a heavy steel door at the front and a heavily barred window at the back that does not open,” she described. “Walls are covered in white; the paint chipped off by bored prisoners reveals another layer of primer white. No family photos or art or reminder notes are allowed to be taped to the walls; they must remain bare. Our windowsills would be a great place to display greeting cards and pictures, but those are off-limits, too....”

“There is a concrete platform and thin plastic mat, a 14-by-20-inch shelf and round stool mounted to the floor, and a steel toilet-sink combo unit. We get no boxes to contain our few personal items. Everything must fit on the shelf, bed or end up on the floor.”

Her cell is searched daily by guards although, like everyone else in the prison, she is strip searched any time she leaves the unit for a doctor's appointment or a no-contact visit. When she is taken to the showers, she is handcuffed, then locked into a 3-foot-by-3-foot shower stall with a steel cage door for a 15-minute shower. As is the case across the country, visits are conducted behind glass.

Pender was placed in solitary confinement after successfully escaping from prison in 2008. With the assistance of a guard who had been having sex with her and several other women in the prison, she escaped. After 136 days, she was found, re-arrested and returned to prison, where she began her unending stint in solitary confinement.

Because Pender is considered a high escape risk, the administration has taken steps to isolate her even within the segregation unit. “Other women could talk to each other through their doors, but they were instructed to never talk to me or else they'd be punished,” she recounted. “The male guards were never to speak to me unless there was a second guard present, and only to give me orders. Female guards only spoke when absolutely necessary, per orders, except they chatted freely with any other prisoner."

As in many jails and prisons, those with mental health concerns are often placed in segregation. "One of them is going to be released to society this month," Pender wrote. "She has been in solitary for six or eight months because she has repeatedly cut herself with razors, including her throat, several times. Their solution: Lock her in a room and don't give her a razor."

Another woman spent two-and-a-half years in segregation, originally for disruptive behavior. Her stay was extended each time she hurt herself. "She cut her wrists in the shower. They found her, took her to the hospital, stitched her up, put her back in lock and wrote her up for self-mutilation."

"She ripped the stitches out and got another battery write-up. Threw a mop bucket at the sergeant for another assault write-up and was completely maxed out on her sentence, so they let her go home from solitary. She returned that same year with new charges. She never got therapy while here – or any mental health care that she obviously needed."

While Pender did not enter with preexisting mental health concerns, years of little to no human contact has taken its toll. At times she feels lethargic and depressed. In 2010, she had a psychotic break, which lasted nine months. Since then, she has been on and off half a dozen kinds of psychotropic medications.

"I didn't need the meds for the two years I spent in godawful Marion County Jail and didn't need them for five years at Rockville prison," she recalled. "But when you lock people in rooms for long periods of time, the isolation degenerates us into madness, or at least depression."

Others with no preexisting mental health conditions have also been affected. "I watched a woman claw chunks out of her cheeks and nose and write on the window with her blood," Pender said. "My neighbor bashed her head against the concrete until officers dragged her out to a padded cell. Two other women tried to asphyxiate themselves with shoestrings and bras."

In Florida, faced with the prospect of ten months in CM SHU, a woman attempted suicide. "I had hung myself and was quite dead when the guards cut me down. My heart must've stopped because of the loss of involuntary functions, but still they wrapped me in a sheet and rushed me to medical and succeeded in reviving me," she recalled.

Despite being locked in a cell the size of a bathroom for the foreseeable future, Pender hopes the increased outrage about solitary confinement leads to concrete changes. What would she ask people to do?

"They can help by contacting their legislators and judges about their views on long-term solitary confinement. They can help by supporting small groups of activists and organizations who are passionate about this topic."

"Many people don't have the desire to donate two hours of their week or month to a group, but what about two hours of their monthly wages? Or the book of stamps and box of envelopes that has been collecting dust since email was invented?"

"There are lots of ways to help change the system. Whatever you choose to do, just DO something. Just having conversations with others about the subject is doing something. Someone else might volunteer to type up and format a newsletter. Help design a website. Circulate the info. Make

Sent to solitary for reporting sexual assault

IT SEEMS ABSURD THAT A PERSON WHO HAS been sexually assaulted would be punished for speaking up, especially since prison policy prohibits sexual contact between staff and the people whom they guard. Yet, in many women's prisons, many of those who report rape and other forms of sexual assault by prison personnel are sent to solitary confinement.

After enduring over a year of repeated sexual assaults by a guard, Stacy Barker became one of 31 women incarcerated in Michigan who filed Nunn v. MDOC, a 1996 lawsuit against the Department of Corrections for the widespread sexual abuse by prison guards. The following year, Barker was repeatedly sexually assaulted by an officer who was also a defendant in Nunn.

After a month of silence, she reported the assaults to a prison psychiatrist. Barker was immediately placed in segregation and then transferred to Huron Valley Center, which was then a psychiatric hospital for prisoners. There, she reported that hospital attendants verbally harassed her.

In October 1997, Barker attempted suicide. She did not receive counseling or psychiatric evaluation. Instead, three male guards stripped her naked, placed her in five-point restraints (a procedure in which a prisoner is placed on her back in a spread-eagle position with her hands, feet and chest secured by straps) on a bed with no blanket for nine hours. She was then placed on suicide watch. She reported that one of the staff who monitored her repeatedly told her he would "bring her down a few rungs."

Placing women in solitary confinement for reporting staff sexual harassment or abuse is far from rare. In 1996, Human Rights Watch found that, in Michigan, incarcerated women who report staff sexual misconduct are placed in segregation pending the institution's investigation of their cases. The placement is allegedly for the woman's own protection. The five other states investigated also had similar practices of placing women in segregation after they reported abuse.

Not much has changed in the 13 years since Human Rights Watch chronicled the pervasive and persistent sexual abuse and use of retaliatory segregation in 11 women's prisons. Former staff at Ohio's Reformatory for Women have stated that women who reported sexual abuse are subjected to lengthy periods of time in solitary confinement, where cells often had feces and blood smeared on the wall.

In Kentucky, a woman who saved evidence from her sexual assault was placed in segregation for 50 days. In Illinois, a prison administrator threatened to add a year onto the sentence of a woman who attempted to report repeated sexual assaults. She was then placed in solitary confinement.

In 2003, the Prison Rape Elimination Act (PREA) became law, ostensibly to address the widespread sexual abuse in the nation's jails and prisons. Among its recommendations was "the timely and comprehensive investigation of staff sexual misconduct involving rape or other sexual assault on inmates."

However, this has not stopped the widespread practice of utilizing solitary to punish those who speak out. An investigation into sexual abuse at Alabama's Tutwiler Prison for Women found that women who report sexual abuse "are routinely placed in segregation by the warden."

Some prison systems have also created new rules to continue discouraging reports of staff sexual assault. At Denver Women's Correctional Facility, a woman reported that prison officials responded to PREA by creating a rule called "False Reporting to Authorities."

"A lot of us do not report any kind of staff misconduct because history has proven that any kind of reports true or false are found [by the administration] to be false," she stated. "When it was found to be false, the people were immediately found guilty and sent to administrative segregation." In some cases, a woman may not even file an official complaint but may only be speaking within earshot of another staff member.

"I didn't want to believe it, but then I experienced it first hand with a close acquaintance of mine. She had conversations with a guard and he asked sexually explicit questions about what she would be able to do in bed because of her disability and it went on for a while.

"She came to me and said she didn't want to be around him and she told an office worker about him and he ended up writing a report on her, before she could do it to him, and she was eventually questioned. I was questioned and I told the investigator that I believed her and that the officer was a pervert and flirted openly with any girl who was desperate for a man's attention.

"I told him I felt like he was a predator and shouldn't be working at a women's prison. I later found out she went to the hole and was going to be Ad Seg'd just like the others but she left on her mandatory parole to go back to court and was re-sentenced and brought back. Luckily they didn't Ad Seg her when she came back. I'm not sure why they dropped it but maybe it was because she was gone for a while."

Under PREA, those accused of sexual assault are sent to solitary confinement even before the charges are proven. In California, Amy Preasmyer was placed in solitary confinement after being accused of sexual assault by another woman.

"I was abruptly removed from my bed late in the evening to face an extended wait and then a transfer to Ad-Seg," she reported. "Upon entering my newly assigned chambers at 3 a.m., I found the toilet was backed up and a DD3 (EOP) [person with a disability] had urinated everywhere prior to me, leaving extremely unsanitary conditions and aromas." She was not allowed to access supplies that would allow her to clean or disinfect her cell.

Although she was eventually cleared of all charges, being in Ad Seg forced her to miss her final examinations for college. During that time, she also lost the privilege to shop, walk outside or even call home.

Preasmyer reflected on the double standard between prison staff and prisoners accused under PREA: "Had this woman falsely accused an officer, would that officer have been arrested and forced to relinquish rights pending results of the investigation into the accusation? Would the employee suffer a wage loss? Would disciplinary action and consequences be rendered to the accuser once charges turned out to be baseless?"

After reading Preasmyer's article in her segregation cell in Indiana, Sarah Jo Pender, who has spent five years in solitary confinement after an officer helped her escape, agreed. She noted that, although the officer who helped her escape had had sex with her and seven other women in the prison, he evaded a sexual misconduct charge as part of a plea bargain.

He was sentenced to seven years in prison and released after two years. As far as Pender knows, he spent no time in solitary confinement. On the other hand, the superintendent at the Indiana Women's Prison has told her that she will remain in segregation so long as she is incarcerated so that he knows where she is at any given time.

We might know more about the prevalence of isolating those who report sexual abuse if that threat didn't hang over their heads. But it does, bullying who-knows-how-many into silence. As one woman in Texas reported:

"When officers and inmates are found to be involved, the common course of action here is to move her to another facility. If she consented in any way, she will be placed in Ad Seg. Being moved with the jacket of a prior officer relationship can make time very difficult. And, if they found any reason to write the inmate a major case, it also costs her at least a one-year parole set-off. Being moved, time in isolation, a label and a set-off? Those are powerful motivations to keep a girl quiet."

Tennessee Senate Judiciary Committee Holds Hearings on Criminal Justice Reform

ON SEPTEMBER 15 AND 16, 2014, while Tennessee's General Assembly was out of session, the Senate Judiciary Committee held hearings on criminal justice reform – the first time a legislative body in the state has comprehensively addressed that topic for at least a decade. The hearings were chaired by Senator Brian Kelsey, and speakers testified on issues ranging from the history of sentencing in Tennessee to the state's growing prison population, high crime rate and potential solutions to those problems.

According to the FBI, Tennessee had the highest violent crime rate in the nation based on 2012 statistics.

Criminal defense attorney David Raybin, a former district attorney and former member of the Tennessee Sentencing Commission (abolished in 1995), who helped develop Tennessee's criminal sentencing statutes, testified about the history of sentencing laws in the state, including the Class X laws and 1989 Sentencing Reform Act. He noted that the Sentencing Commission had made a number of recommendations that were ignored by lawmakers.

Others who testified included officials from the district attorney's office and attorney general's office. The DA's office complained that criminal sentences in Tennessee mislead the public and victims, as a ten-year sentence does not mean defendants will serve 10 years. Rather, they are eligible for parole at 30% of their sentence for standard range 1 offenders, and those with "truth in sentencing" sentences may serve 85% rather than 100% of their sentences. Further, life sentences do not mean life in prison, as life-sentenced prisoners can be paroled after serving 51 calendar years. With respect to parole, the DA's office did not mention that the average parole grant rate in Tennessee is around 36%.

Two members of the Vera Institute of Justice, Rebecca Silber and Nancy Fishman, testified about their review of Tennessee's criminal justice system and offered suggestions for reforms; the Vera Institute provides research and technical assistance to government agencies to help improve justice systems, policies and practices.

Marc Levin, director of the Center for Effective Justice at the Texas Public Policy Foundation and policy director of Right on Crime, spoke about what Texas has done to reduce its prison population through criminal justice reforms – although Texas presently has the largest state prison population in the nation.

Levin observed that 90% of Tennessee's corrections budget goes to the state's prison system instead of probation, drug courts or community supervision programs. "Our view is, the pendulum's swung a little bit too far," he stated.

Other speakers at the Committee hearings included Anderson County Mayor Terry Frank, Tennessee ACLU director Hedy Weinberg, Knoxville police chief David Rausch, commissioners of the Department of Mental Health and Department of Safety, Tennessee Department of Correction (TDOC) Commissioner Derrick Schofield, the director of the Tennessee Association of Professional Bail Agents, Court of Criminal Appeals Judge John Everett Williams, the director of the Heritage Foundation's Edwin Meese III Center for Legal and Judicial Studies, and Tennessee State Employees Association (TSEA) director Tommy Francis.

Commissioner Schofield discussed the need to reduce recidivism rates, while Francis spoke about challenges faced by TDOC employees represented by the TSEA. Charlie White, director of the Association of Professional Bail Agents, mainly addressed the contributions of the for-profit bail industry in terms of providing a means for people to get out of jail (those who can afford to make bond, that is).

Vanderbilt University Professor Chris Slobogin testified three times over the two-day hearings and discussed what other states have done in terms of criminal justice reform – including pretrial release initiatives, de-criminalization, expanding re-entry and community corrections programs, and enacting probation and parole reforms. He also presented recommendations from the Tennessee Consultation on Criminal Justice – a faith-based group working on reform of the state's justice system.

Those recommendations included: 1) ending the practice of sending technical probation and parole violators to prison when short jail stays of 2 to 3 days would be more effective; 2) increasing parole grant rates; 3) developing effective reentry and community supervision strategies; 4) conducting a study to examine successful programs and policies implemented in other states; 5) reinstituting the Tennessee Sentencing Commission to provide guidance to the legislature about changes to sentencing laws; 6) reinstituting the joint legislative Oversight Committee on Corrections, which was disbanded in 2011, to exercise oversight over the TDOC; and 7) ensuring that the TDOC has current and accurate data with respect to recidivism rates and other statistics.

Additionally, Professor Slobogin cited the need to re-evaluate the role of using privately-operated prisons in Tennessee and recommended that the state consider justice reinvestment initiatives, whereby savings from criminal justice policies that reduce the prison population are reinvested in communities affected by high incarceration rates – such as job creation programs and re-entry programs.

Overall, there was consensus that reforms are needed in Tennessee's criminal justice system, including changes in sentencing laws, alternatives to incarceration and the need to address a growing prison population – which is currently around 21,180 in TDOC facilities plus another 8,700 convicted felons in local jails. The state recently contracted with Nashville-based Corrections Corporation of America to house prisoners at a 2,500-bed facility in Trousdale County that is expected to open in 2015. CCA already holds one-quarter of the state's prison population in privately-operated facilities.

PLN FUNDRAISER 2014

*Please Support Prison Legal News
and the Human Rights Defense Center!*

Prison Legal News, a project of the non-profit Human Rights Defense Center, cannot fund its operations through subscriptions and book sales alone. We rely on donations from our readers and supporters – like you!

PLN conducts just one fundraiser a year; we don't bombard our readers with donation requests, we only ask that if you are able to contribute something to our important work, please do so. Every dollar counts and is greatly appreciated and will be put to good use. No donation is too small, even books of stamps!

Where does your donation go? Here's some of what we've done in the past year:

- HRDC, a co-founder and leader of the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice, was instrumental in getting the Federal Communications Commission to reduce the cost of prison phone calls, which the FCC did when caps on interstate prison phone rates went into effect in February 2014!
- PLN settled censorship suits against jails in Ventura County, California; Upshur and Comal County, Texas; and Kenosha County, Wisconsin. In all of those cases, the jails agreed to change their mail policies to allow prisoners to receive PLN and other correspondence.
- PLN has other censorship lawsuits pending against the Nevada DOC, the Florida DOC and jails in Texas, Tennessee, Virginia, Arizona, Michigan, Georgia and Florida.
- PLN settled a wrongful death suit brought by the family of a Washington state prisoner who died due to inadequate medical care, and settled a lawsuit filed on behalf of a former prisoner who lost her baby after guards at a CCA-run jail in Tennessee delayed sending her to a hospital.

With your help we can do more! Please send your donation to:

PLN Support Gifts

Gift option 1

As a token of our gratitude for your support, we are providing the PLN card when making a donation of $50. The card is hand embroidered by women prisoners in Bolivia who are paid a fair wage for the cards to help support their families.

Gift option 2

In recognition of your support, we are providing the PLN hemp tote bag when making a donation of at least $75. Handmade in Vermont using hemp fiber. Carry books and groceries stylishly and help end the war on drugs!

Gift option 3

To show our appreciation for your support, we are providing the following selection of books for you to choose from when making a donation of $100. Donations of $100 or more can choose one free title. Each $100 donation entitles you to another free title; i.e., donate $500 and you get five books! $1,000 and you get everything on the page! Please circle the books you want and send the corresponding donation amount.

Gift option 4

As a thank you gift for your support, we are providing the entire PLN anthology of critically acclaimed books on mass imprisonment signed by editor Paul Wright! (The Celling of America, Prison Nation and Prison Profiteers) plus the PLN hemp tote bag to carry the books in when making a donation of $250 or more.

How the Courts View ACA Accreditation

by Alex Friedmann

THE AMERICAN CORRECTIONAL ASSOCIATION (ACA), a private non-profit organization composed mostly of current and former corrections officials, provides accreditation to prisons, jails and other detention facilities.

According to the ACA, "Accreditation is a system of verification that correctional agencies/facilities comply with national standards promulgated by the American Correctional Association. Accreditation is achieved through a series of reviews, evaluations, audits and hearings."

To achieve accreditation a facility must comply with 100% of applicable mandatory standards and at least 90% of applicable non-mandatory standards. Under some circumstances, the ACA may waive certain accreditation standards. There are different standards for different types of facilities, such as adult correctional institutions, jails, juvenile detention facilities and boot camp programs.

The standards are established by the ACA with no oversight by government agencies, and the organization basically sells accreditation by charging fees ranging from $8,100 to $19,500, depending on the number of days and auditors involved and the number of facilities being accredited. [See, e.g.: PLN, Aug. 2014, p.24].

The ACA relies heavily on such fees; it reported receiving more than $4.5 million in accreditation fees in 2011 – almost half its total revenue that year. The organization thus has a financial incentive to provide as many accreditations as possible.

Notably, the accreditation process is basically a paper review. The ACA does not provide oversight or ongoing monitoring of correctional facilities, but only verifies whether a facility has policies that comply with the ACA's self-promulgated standards at the time of accreditation. Following initial accreditation, facilities are re-accredited at three-year intervals.

As a result, some prisons have experienced significant problems despite being accredited. For example, the Otter Creek Correctional Center in Kentucky, operated by Corrections Corporation of America (CCA), was accredited by the ACA in 2009 when at least five prison employees were prosecuted for raping or sexually abusing prisoners. [See: PLN, Oct. 2009, p.40]. Kentucky and Hawaii withdrew their female prisoners from Otter Creek following the sex scandal, but the facility did not lose its ACA accreditation. The prison has since closed.

The privately-operated Walnut Grove Youth Correctional Facility in Mississippi was accredited by the ACA even though the U.S. Department of Justice found "systemic, egregious practices" at the facility, including "brazen" sexual activity between staff and offenders that was "among the worst that we've seen in any facility anywhere in the nation." When approving a settlement in a class-action lawsuit against Walnut Grove in 2012, a U.S. District Court wrote that the facility had "allowed a cesspool of unconstitutional and inhuman acts and conditions to germinate, the sum of which places the offenders at substantial ongoing risk." [See: PLN, Nov. 2013, p.30].

More recently, the ACA-accredited Idaho Correctional Center, operated by CCA, has been cited for extremely high levels of violence, understaffing and fraudulent reporting of staffing hours. A video of CCA guards failing to intervene while one prisoner was brutally beaten by another has been widely circulated. CCA was held in contempt by a federal court in September 2013 for violating a settlement in a class-action lawsuit against the facility, and a separate suit alleges that CCA employees collaborated with gang members to maintain control at the prison. The state took control of the Idaho Correctional Center on July 1, 2014 and the FBI is currently conducting an investigation into CCA's staffing fraud. [See: PLN, Oct. 2013, p.28; May 2013, p.22; Feb. 2012, p.30]. Regardless, the facility remains accredited by the ACA.

Prisoners who litigate prison and jail conditions cases sometimes try to raise claims related to violations of ACA standards, even though the standards alone do not create enforceable rights. On the other side of such lawsuits, the ACA says the benefits of accreditation for corrections officials include “a stronger defense against litigation through documentation and the demonstration of a ‘good faith’ effort to improve conditions of confinement.”

But how do the courts view ACA accreditation – and comparable accreditation of prison and jail medical services by the National Commission on Correctional Health Care (NCCHC) – both in terms of claims alleging violations of accreditation standards and as a defense by prison officials?

The U.S. Supreme Court noted in Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 543 n.27 (1979) that accreditation does not determine constitutionality. With respect to standards established by organizations such as the American Correctional Association, the Court wrote: “[W]hile the recommendations of these various groups may be instructive in certain cases, they simply do not establish the constitutional minima; rather, they establish goals recommended by the organization in question.”

In Grenning v. Miller-Stout, 739 F.3d 1235, 1241 (9th Cir. 2014), the defendants contended that the level of lighting in a prisoner’s cell “passed the national accreditation standards of the ACA....” However, the Ninth Circuit said it was “unable to determine ... the significance of the ‘accreditation’ by the ACA. We are not informed of the standards of the ACA, nor are we informed about the thoroughness of the testing performed” at the prison. The mere fact of ACA accreditation did not entitle the defendants to summary judgment on the prisoner’s Eighth Amendment claim. [See article on p.40].

The Fifth Circuit stated in Gates v. Cook, 376 F.3d 323, 337 (5th Cir. 2004) that it was “absurd to suggest that the federal courts should subvert their judgment as to alleged Eighth Amendment violations to the ACA whenever it has relevant standards. Additionally, the ACA’s limited inspections are not be [sic] binding as factual findings on the magistrate or on this court. While compliance with ACA’s standards may be a relevant consideration, it is not per se evidence of constitutionality.”

Further, in a lawsuit challenging inadequate medical care in the jail system in Maricopa County, Arizona, a federal district court wrote: “The Board Defendants argue that because the parties stipulated to incorporate in the Amended Judgment the ‘essential’ standards for health services in jails of the National Commission on Correctional Health Care (‘NCCHC’), Correctional Health Services adopted policies conforming to NCCHC standards, and Correctional Health Services substantially complies with all of the ‘essential’ NCCHC standards, they have met their burden in proving there are no current and ongoing violations of pretrial detainees’ federal rights.”

However, “The Court decides independently whether there are current and ongoing violations of pretrial detainees’ constitutional rights and does not rely on any determinations made by an accrediting organization such as the NCCHC. The NCCHC ‘essential’ standards do not specifically focus on all of pretrial detainees’ constitutional rights.” Additionally, the district court noted that “Some of the NCCHC ‘essential’ standards address administrative functions and are not narrowly tailored to meet constitutional requirements,” and “[a]lthough the NCCHC standards may be helpful for a jail, the Court makes its findings based on the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments of the United States Constitution.”

The court found that healthcare services provided by the defendants remained unconstitutional despite NCCHC accreditation. See: Graves v. Arpaio, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 85935 (D. Ariz. Oct. 22, 2008) [PLN, Jan. 2010, p.43; May 2009, p.28].

In Texas, a federal district court commented on accreditation of Texas Department of Criminal Justice (TDCJ) facilities by both the ACA and NCCHC.

“While TDCJ’s participation in the ACA accreditation process is to be commended, accreditation, in itself, is not a clear indication that TDCJ is properly following its policies and procedures. Experts from both parties recognized the limitations of ACA accreditation,” the court wrote, noting “that ACA accreditation is a tool, but not a constitutional standard.”

The district court also remarked that one expert had “testified to a number of examples where a prison system was accredited by the ACA, but was, nevertheless, held by a court to be operating in an unconstitutional fashion, including prisons in Florida and the San Quentin prison in California.”

With respect to accreditation by the NCCHC, the district court stated: “Rather than analyze the actual quality of the medical care received by inmates, the NCCHC’s evaluation focuses on the written standards, policies, protocols, bureaucracy, and infrastructure that makes up the medical care system [cite omitted]. Further undermining defendants’ attempt to use NCCHC accreditation as a proxy for a certification of the constitutionality of its medical care is the fact that at least two of the plaintiffs’ experts who testified about profound shortcomings in the quality of care in TDCJ-ID also work as NCCHC accreditors.... While NCCHC accreditation does bolster defendants’ claims that its medical care system is functioning constitutionally, the accreditation simply cannot be dispositive of such a conclusion.” See: Ruiz v. Johnson, 37 F.Supp.2d 855, 902, 924-25 (S.D. Tex. 1999), rev’d on other grounds, 243 F.3d 941 (5th Cir. 2001).

A U.S. District Court in Puerto Rico also found that prison medical care was unconstitutional despite accreditation by the NCCHC, with the court noting “the National Commission on Correctional Health Care in 1992 had accredited the medical care programs at four prisons and provisionally accredited four more, with several additional prisons under consideration for accreditation. However, one of the monitor’s consultants, Dr. Ronald Shansky, found noncompliance with at least one essential standard at every institution the Commission had accredited.” The court further observed that “During this investigation, Department of Health personnel provided the monitor’s staff with credible evidence that other employees had falsified documents in support of accreditation.” See: Feliciano v. Gonzalez, 13 F.Supp.2d 151, 158 n.3 (D.P.R. 1998).

A Florida district court addressed ACA accreditation in LaMarca v. Turner, 662 F.Supp. 647, 655 (S.D. Fla. 1987), appeal dismissed, 861 F.2d 724 (11th Cir. 1988), stating: “Defendants make much of the relevance to this litigation of the accreditation of prisons and [Glades Correctional Institution] in particular by the American Correctional Association. The Magistrate found that the GCI accreditation had ‘virtually no significance’ to this lawsuit because accredited prisons have been found unconstitutional by courts. Having considered the GCI accreditation along with the remainder of the evidence, the undersigned district court finds it of marginal relevance in this case.”

And in a challenge to the adequacy of the law library at the Buena Vista Correctional Facility in Colorado, a district court stated it was “simply ludicrous” for the defendants to argue they were entitled to summary judgment because “the American Correctional Association formally accredited” the facility and ACA standards address prison law libraries. See: Boulies v. Ricketts, 518 F.Supp. 687, 689 (D. Colo. 1981).

However, other courts have taken ACA accreditation into consideration when determining the constitutionality of policies or practices at correctional facilities, such as in Yellow Horse v. Pennington County, 225 F.3d 923, 928 (8th Cir. 2000) (suicide prevention procedures) and Grayson v. Peed, 195 F.3d 692, 697 (4th Cir. 1999) (death of restrained prisoner).

Therefore, incarcerated litigants should use caution when basing arguments on violations of accreditation standards rather than violations of constitutional or statutory rights, and should note the above case law when corrections officials raise accreditation as a defense in lawsuits related to conditions of confinement in prisons and jails. ■

States Renewing Their Prison Phone Contracts

As state DOCs renew or rebid their prison phone contracts, you can help urge them to lower intrastate phone rates and eliminate commission kickbacks!

The Campaign for Prison Phone Justice needs your help in:

**** North Dakota, Oklahoma, Washington ******

The Departments of Corrections in the above states are in the process of re-bidding or renewing their prison phone contracts. Most DOCs receive a commission (kickback) on revenue generated from calls made by prisoners, which results in excessively high phone rates. Although the FCC voted last year to cap the costs of interstate (long distance) prison calls, which went into effect on February 11, 2014, the order does not apply to intrastate (in-state) calls. An estimated 85% of prison phone calls are in-state. This is an opportunity to ask DOCs to forgo commissions and ensure their new prison phone contracts are based on the lowest cost to those who pay for the calls – mostly prisoners' families.

Take Action NOW! Here's What YOU Can Do!

Ask your family members and friends to write, email, call and fax the DOC and the governor's office (addresses and contacts are listed below), requesting that the DOC: 1) forgo commission payments when re-bidding or renewing its prison phone contract, and 2) base the new contract on the lowest calling costs. Lower prison phone rates should apply not just to long distance calls but also to in-state calls. For a sample letter or to easily send an email, visit the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice's website and click on the "Take Action" tab:

Leading with Conviction: JustLeadershipUSA

by Glenn Martin and Sasha Graham

FOR DECADES, ADVOCATES AND SCHOLARS alike have publicly decried the crippling financial and human costs of mass incarceration. Today their calls for reform are amplified by an emerging bipartisan consensus that current incarceration trends are unsustainable, ineffective and increasingly harmful to individuals, families, communities and society as a whole.

Several states, including New York, New Jersey and California, have prioritized criminal justice reforms intended to reduce excessive criminalization and incarceration.<sup>1</sup> Last year, 300 bills were introduced on the state level that promoted smarter, healthier approaches to crime prevention and reductions in our overreliance on incarceration.<sup>2</sup> Yet despite this abundance of political will and a growing legion of zealous advocates, we have yet to realize significant and widespread reform of our criminal justice system. In fact, recent successes notwithstanding, the justice system continues to operate at full throttle, consuming millions of individuals, countless families and entire communities.

The problem is that for far too long the individuals and communities directly impacted by mass incarceration have been glaringly absent – or worse, omitted – from the conversation. Ironically, in a movement established in their name, the currently and formerly incarcerated are often relegated to roles of service provision and symbolism. It is not enough that advocates for reform be genuine believers in the depravity and inhumanity of our carceral policies. The failure of policy makers, advocates and service providers to invest time and energy into cultivating meaningful ways to work collaboratively with people and communities most impacted by the criminal justice system has expunged the expertise needed to achieve substantial reform.

No community wants, needs or understands the urgency of sweeping reform more than those held captive by the disastrous policy failures of a broken justice system. These individuals not only bring a valuable and culturally-competent frame to the discussion, but “living closer to the problem” often means that they have given significant thought to possible solutions. In what appears to be a watershed moment for criminal justice reform we need these communities of the currently and formerly incarcerated to instruct us on what needs to change, where we can improve and what strategies we need to implement.

JustLeadershipUSA is dedicated to putting new and authentic drivers in the seat of the reform locomotive. We know that it is not for lack of intelligence or hard work that formerly incarcerated people rarely assume roles of leadership, but a lack of access to resources and opportunities. We believe that everyone has the capacity to lead, though not everyone is exposed to opportunities that teach them critical leadership skills. Through our leadership development training program we instruct formerly incarcerated people with proven leadership capacity in their respective careers and communities, to drive decarceration efforts around the country.

Together with the Center for Institutional and Social Change at Columbia University, JustLeadershipUSA has collaborated with over 50 formerly incarcerated leaders to research, develop and employ a dynamic and inclusive leadership model. Our cohort-based training practices include peer coaching sessions, peer group learning projects and individualized one-on-one sessions, to produce a sustainable leadership community that fosters ongoing development and support long after the program is complete.

While we believe those closest to the problem are closest to the solution, we know this does not exempt the rest of us from playing our part in correcting the wanton harm produced by four decades of failed criminal justice policy. Contrary to popular sentiment, mass incarceration is neither a minority issue nor a poor people’s issue, but an American issue. The criminal justice system is a menacing threat to our democracy – squandering the potential of millions of Americans, destroying families and communities, and wasting billions of taxpayer dollars each year.

At JustLeadershipUSA, we know that the presence of allies has been crucial to every movement against systemic injustice (the abolition of slavery, the women’s rights movement, the Civil Rights movement, etc.). As such, we employ a membership model to encourage people of all backgrounds, including those who are incarcerated, to band together against policies that are wasteful and ineffective and to incentivize investment in practices that are fairer, smarter and morally aligned with our values.

Our founder, Glenn E. Martin, a national criminal justice reform advocate and formerly incarcerated individual, created JustLeadershipUSA because he believes one of the most unjust features of the existing system is that the millions of men and women in America's prisons have been barred from making decisions regarding their own lives. JustLeadershipUSA knows that systemic change is accelerated and amplified through strength in numbers. We ask that people who are currently incarcerated and the more than 60 million American adults who have criminal records<sup>3</sup> become members of our movement to elevate the voices of those impacted by incarceration and articulate their own salvation, as only they can.

By joining JustLeadershipUSA you are safeguarding against the adoption of policies contrary to your best interests and the health and well-being of your families and communities. As a member your contributions will fund our efforts to replace mandatory sentencing laws with more flexible and individualized guidelines, eliminate the use of "three-strike" laws, eliminate tough-on-crime-era truth in sentencing laws, expand labor market opportunities for formerly incarcerated people and encourage the increased use of prison population reduction strategies such as executive pardons, parole release, clemency and merit time. Together, with a united voice and a united vision for reform, we can halve the U.S. prison population by 2030 and afford those who are incarcerated equal opportunities to be part of the solution.

To become a member of JustLeadershipUSA, please send $10.00 (the cost of annual membership) to JustLeadershipUSA at 112 West 34th Street, Suite 2104, New York, NY 10120. ## Washington State: Injunction Entered Against Lewis County in PLN Censorship Suit

ON SEPTEMBER 10, 2014 A FEDERAL judge entered a preliminary injunction against Lewis County, Washington in a lawsuit challenging a postcard-only mail policy at the county jail.

The lawsuit, filed by Prison Legal News in April 2014, alleged that the jail's policy of restricting incoming and outgoing correspondence to postcards violated PLN's rights under the First Amendment. Further, the complaint argued that the jail's failure to provide notice to the sender when mail was censored or rejected violated the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

While county officials claimed the jail had changed its mail policy after the suit was filed, "and is now allowing news sources to distribute both publications and other forms of correspondence to prisoners," U.S. Magistrate Judge J. Richard Creatura wrote there was "substantial evidence to believe that this policy has not yet been adopted." Further, "First Amendment rights are too important to be subject to such arbitrariness," he added.

Between September and October 2013, pursuant to the jail's postcard-only policy, jailers had rejected dozens of letters sent to prisoners by PLN, including subscription brochures, book catalogs and copies of court rulings.

"The postcard-only policy drastically reduces prisoners' and other correspondents' ability to communicate. It is more than a mere inconvenience and becomes a substantial barrier to First Amendment rights," Judge Creatura stated, noting that the Washington Department of Corrections and other jail systems in the state, including those in King, Pierce and Spokane counties, do not have postcard-only policies.

The district court enjoined county officials from "restricting incoming and outgoing prisoner mail to postcards only," from "rejecting mail to or from prisoners without providing notice to the prisoner" and from "rejecting mail from non-prisoner correspondents without providing notice to the non-prisoner correspondent." The court also required appeals of rejected mail to be referred to a jail official "other than the person who originally rejected the correspondence."

"We are pleased that the court found the constitutional violations at the jail warranted the entry of an injunction against Lewis County," said PLN editor Paul Wright. "No one is above the law or the Constitution – and sometimes it takes a federal judge to make that clear."

Jesse Wing, one of PLN's attorneys, noted that the jail's restrictive mail policy not only harmed pretrial detainees who have not been convicted, but also people in the community who want to correspond with prisoners. Communicating with the outside world is "essential to maintaining family, employment, educational and other important relationships critical for a person to productively return to society after time in jail," he said. "The court's order has a huge positive effect, helping many people."

PLN is represented by attorneys Jesse A. Wing and Katherine Chamberlain with the Seattle law firm of MacDonald Hoague & Bayless, and by Human Rights Defense Center general counsel Lance Weber. The case remains pending. See: Prison Legal News v. Lewis County, U.S.D.C. (W.D. Wash.), Case No. 3:14-cv-05304-JRC. ■

Drug Courts Partner with Pharmaceutical Company to Combat Heroin, Alcohol Abuse

THE 406TH DISTRICT DRUG COURT IN Webb County, Texas has turned to a new approach for breaking the cycle of addiction related to heroin, opiate and alcohol abuse: The court formed a partnership with Irish pharmaceutical company Alkermes plc to provide a drug called Vivitrol to drug court participants.

Vivitrol is an intramuscular medication delivered once-monthly by injection. It works to block the production of endorphins, which in turn prevents the brain from producing surges of dopamine – the body's pleasure hormone. Essentially, Vivitrol prevents a person from getting high or drunk. As a result, if a heroin addict shoots up or an alcoholic takes a drink, he or she won't feel anything pleasurable – although Vivitrol is only meant to be used after a person has detoxed or stopped drinking.

A primary benefit of the drug compared to other medical treatments, such as Suboxone and methadone, is that Vivitrol is not addictive.

One dose of Vivitrol lasts 30 days, though the drug is expensive; the cost can range from $800 to $1,200 for a single shot. Alkermes agreed to a three-year partnership with Webb County in which the company will provide one free dose of Vivitrol to drug court participants – a $200,000 commitment.

The court also received a $1 million Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration grant to implement a client treatment plan that includes Vivitrol and cognitive intervention. In addition, Webb County Commissioners approved a half-million dollars in November 2012 to build a new adult detoxification and residential treatment facility for drug offenders. Vivitrol will be given to people released from the residential program.

The drug is not without its critics, but has been used for three decades. Known side effects include possible liver damage or hepatitis, risk of overdose if patients continue using drugs or alcohol while taking Vivitrol, and allergic reactions and depression.

The federal government first developed the drug Naltrexone some 30 years ago to prevent heroin relapses. It was approved by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) in pill form in 1984 as a treatment for heroin addiction, and in 1994 for alcoholism.

But the drug required a strict regimen of daily doses. The National Institute on Drug Abuse funded research in the 1990s to develop a form of Naltrexone that could be delivered by injection. The result was Vivitrol, which was approved by the FDA in 2006 to treat alcoholism and in 2010 to treat opiate addiction.

David McCann, of the National Institute on Drug Abuse's Division of Pharmacotherapies and Medical Consequences, said a Russian study used by the FDA to grant approval found that more than one-third of Vivitrol patients – 36% – stayed drug-free and in treatment for six months, compared to less than one-fourth – 23% – of those not taking the drug.

But John Schwarzlose, who heads the Betty Ford Center in California, is among the skeptics who warn that research on Vivitrol is "spotty."

"The pharmaceutical company will have you believe it is the cure for alcoholism," Schwarzlose wrote in an email to the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. "But recovery is learning to live without mood-altering chemicals."

Still, testimonials of Vivitrol's success caught the ear of Gil Kerlikowske, then the head of the White House's Office of National Drug Control Policy. After visiting a clinic in St. Louis, Missouri in August 2012, Kerlikowske told the Post-Dispatch that Vivitrol and similar drugs represent the future of addiction treatment, which until now has relied almost exclusively on therapy or medicines that are just as addictive as the drugs they are designed to replace.

St. Louis Circuit Court Judge James Sullivan, who oversees the city's drug court, began referring offenders to Vivitrol centers instead of prison more than three years ago. He said 60 to 70 defendants on his docket are taking Vivitrol in addition to mandatory therapy in the 11-to-16-month program.

"Vivitrol has assisted us in reaching some very difficult long-term addicts and alcoholics who have not been able to benefit from listening to drug treatment programs that are focused on treatment rather than the cravings," Sullivan said.

In 2011, the Journal of Substance Abuse Treatment published a study in which researchers examined 64 participants from Sullivan's court plus two Michigan drug courts. Half received monthly Vivitrol injections in addition to therapy; the others received only therapy.

The study, funded by Alkermes, determined that Vivitrol patients were about 57% less likely to miss drug court sessions than those who participated in therapy alone. Additionally, only 8% of those treated with Vivitrol were rearrested compared to 26% of the non-Vivitrol participants. The study estimated that keeping addicts from re-entering the criminal justice system generated savings of between $4,000 and $12,000 per person following an initial arrest.

Four offenders in Hocking County, Ohio are among Vivitrol's success stories. In April 2014, they were recognized for breaking their addictions in an emotional graduation ceremony attended by family and friends.

"This is not something that is easy," said Municipal Court Judge Fred Moses, who spearheaded the drive to create a Vivitrol drug court program. He put together a coalition of state and county agencies to secure funding for the program, which began in late 2012.

"It's not about the court, it's about the community and those seeking help and who want to be helped," Moses said.

Authorities in Warren County, Ohio initiated a Vivitrol pilot program in March 2014, led by Common Pleas Court Judge Robert Peeler, who had been actively seeking the medication for heroin-addicted defendants on his docket. Under an $832,000 grant from the Ohio Department of Rehabilitation and Correction, about a dozen people are already enrolled in the program; the grant will cover a total of 120 participants.

"The goal is to try to find some alternative for these non-violent drug offenders to go somewhere other than prison," Peeler said. "Hopefully, that means back to work; they get their kids back if they've lost them. It's giving people a chance for hope; it's giving people a chance for success."

Butler County, Ohio Common Pleas Court Judge Keith Spaeth, who runs the county's specialty drug court, said state money channeled through the Butler County Alcohol and Drug Addiction Services Board enabled him to start a Vivitrol pilot program. He observed that the results, while not conclusive, have been extraordinary.

"It's purely anecdotal at this time but there have been amazing results," Spaeth said. "People we have worked with for over a year and can't seem to make progress, suddenly they are on Vivitrol and they are like a different person. Their personality changes, and they stop using, and they get a job, and they become human."

Butler County Sheriff Richard Jones, however, has called Vivitrol programs in jails a "waste of money."

The drug court in Lane County, Oregon was the first in that state to begin a Vivitrol program, in the summer of 2014. The court received a $38,000 grant from the Oregon Community Foundation to pay for enough doses of the drug to help the roughly 115 eligible people in the county's Adult Drug Court and Veterans Treatment Court.

"The one concrete report that they continue to hear [is] that it takes away the cravings for the addiction," stated Lane County Adult Drug Court Director Bonnie McIrvine. "For opiate addicts, that is the biggest draw."

Meanwhile, Webb County, Texas hopes to use its Vivitrol treatment program as a magnet to attract more funding.

"We want to use this as leverage at the state and federal level to bring in more monies for our program," said Jesse Hernandez, a licensed drug counselor, grant writer and drug court consultant.

Currently, Vivitrol programs are available in courts, jails and prisons in at least 21 states; however, as with most drug courts, participants are usually limited to non-violent, low-level offenders – even though those convicted of violent crimes would also benefit, and perhaps have the greatest need for such treatment programs.

In February 2014, Alkermes estimated net sales of Vivitrol to range from $90 to $100 million this year. For fiscal year 2013, net sales of the drug were $58.1 million. ■

Class-Action Suit Claiming Inadequate Medical Care at Virginia Prison Set for Trial

A DECEMBER 2014 TRIAL DATE HAS been scheduled in a class-action federal lawsuit that could determine the future of health care for prisoners at the Fluvanna Correctional Center for Women (FCCW) in Troy, Virginia.

The suit was filed in July 2012 on behalf of five women incarcerated at Fluvanna, and names as defendants the Virginia Department of Corrections (VDOC), Armor Correctional Health Services and both VDOC and Armor officials for failing to provide constitutionally adequate medical care at FCCW. The Legal Aid Justice Center (LAJC) in Charlottesville, Virginia; the Washington, D.C. law firm of Wiley Rein, LLP and the Washington Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights and Urban Affairs are jointly representing the plaintiffs – Cynthia B. Scott, Robinette D. Fearce, Patricia Knight, Marguerite Richardson and Rebecca L. Scott.

On July 15, 2013, the district court held that Corizon Health, Inc., of Brentwood, Tennessee, which was the contract provider for medical care in VDOC facilities prior to Armor, and which outbid Armor in May 2013 to resume its role as Virginia's correctional health care provider, could be added as a defendant.

The suit does not seek monetary damages, but rather “declaratory and injunctive relief to address and remedy the failure of FCCW, on a systematic, pervasive, and on-going basis,” to provide constitutionally adequate medical care.

An LAJC press release said the quality of health care at FCCW is so deficient that it violates the Eighth Amendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

“The women suffer extreme pain for prolonged periods as a result of the refusal to provide for these women who have no other options for securing life-saving medical care,” said LAJC litigation director Abigail Turner. “Some spend months confined to wheelchairs because medical staff fail to act promptly. Some have died. The human tragedy is almost all the pain and suffering could have been prevented.”

Turner blamed the VDOC's outsourcing of prison health care to private companies as contributing to the problem. “The suffering stems directly from the policies and practices of a for-profit corporation that puts profits over people,” she said.

Turner added that she believes at least ten deaths at FCCW over the past 3 to 4 years could have been prevented had prisoners received sufficient medical treatment.

The complaint cites the failure of health care staff to treat the plaintiffs and other prisoners as examples of system-wide failures. As one example, the lawsuit describes the death of FCCW prisoner Darlene White, an acknowledged diabetic.

White went to the prison's infirmary in the early morning hours of December 21, 2011, complaining of severe headache, nausea and diarrhea. A nurse gave her a shot to relieve her nausea and sent her back to her dorm. Later that day she returned to the infirmary. A nurse checked her blood sugar and “found that it was radically elevated above normal levels,” the suit claims. She was instructed to lie on a bed, where she remained for the next day vomiting and defecating on herself without receiving care or a medical exam. A nurse did try to administer an IV to White, who was “completely non-responsive,” shortly before she died.

A second example cited in the lawsuit involves prisoner Jeanna Wright. Beginning in 2011, Wright complained for months of intense abdominal pain and rectal bleeding, but “for at least one year,” medical staff at FCCW assured her that she was “fine.” Wright was finally taken to the University of Virginia (UVA) Medical Center, where she was diagnosed with Stage IV abdominal cancer. She died only a few weeks later.

The lawsuit cites numerous other examples intended to demonstrate the inadequate care that prisoners receive – or in some cases don't receive. The LAJC claimed that despite having to pay a $5 co-pay for sick call visits, prisoners often wait several months to see a doctor or nurse practitioner to diagnose and treat their medical needs, and that the denial of access to doctors results in medical staff refusing to examine, diagnose and treat serious medical conditions.

The complaint further alleges that Armor's medical staff have failed to provide the plaintiffs with timely referrals and treatment for specialized care such as degenerative disc disease, severe shortness of breath, recurring throat infections and sarcoidosis – a disease that causes inflammation in the body's organs. Even when a specialist prescribes a specific course of treatment, Armor's staff regularly refuse to carry it out.

The suit also contends that prisoners with chronic illnesses, such as hypertension, diabetes, incontinence, frequent constipation, arthritis and other mobility impairments, are deprived of care as their health deteriorates.

FCCW prisoner Taylor Gilmer, 23, is one such example. When Gilmer was seven years old, doctors diagnosed her with Type 1 diabetes; her mother said that since Gilmer has been incarcerated at FCCW, medical staff have been negligent in her treatment.

Her mother claimed that FCCW health care staff misidentified Gilmer's Type 1 diabetes as Type 2, and prison officials prevented her from routinely checking her blood sugar levels.

“I'm really scared,” said her mom. “She cries to me on the phone ... she says ‘I'm losing my vision.’ She's afraid she's going to lose her feet.” She wonders what condition her daughter will be in when she is finally released in 2017. “How bad will she be by then, if she even lives? The outlook is not so good.”

Another FCCW prisoner was approved for medical clemency and released in early December 2013, after doctors at the UVA Medical Center gave her only weeks to live. Donna Kidd spent nearly ten years behind bars on charges of fraud and larceny, and suffered from hepatitis C when she was incarcerated. Barbara Kingery, her older sister, said Kidd's health quickly deteriorated once she was in prison due to poor medical care.

“They are in there paying for their mistakes, but they shouldn't have to pay with their life,” Kingery stated. “If she had gotten the proper treatment, she wouldn't be where she is now.”

The VDOC defendants filed a motion to dismiss the lawsuit, which was denied by the district court in December 2012. The suit alleges that medical care has been equally deficient under both Armor and Corizon, with Corizon underbidding its rival by around $17 million when the contract was rebid in 2013.

"Everything we've seen so far [indicates] more of the same from Corizon," said LJAC attorney Brenda Castaneda. "I wish the care would be better, but that's not what we're hearing from our clients and it's not what we anticipate based on past experiences." She said LJAC had petitioned to add Corizon to the lawsuit so the court could order the company to provide adequate care in the future.

"It doesn't take a rocket scientist to know that their mission is to make money," noted Hope Amezcuita, an attorney with the ACLU of Virginia. "They're a for-profit company. It may be cynical of me to say this, but you can't make more money unless you cut services and treatment and staff."

Attorneys for the plaintiffs said they were left with no other option but to sue. "Each year prisoners at Fluvanna file hundreds of grievances recounting the failure to provide appropriate medical care," said Deborah Golden, an attorney with the Washington Lawyers' Committee. "Yet, [VDOC] has not required [its outside provider] to adopt and improve medical care. By its actions and inactions, [VDOC] has shown deliberate indifference to plaintiffs' serious medical problems and needs."

In April 2014, the district court granted the plaintiffs' motion for $15,980 in attorney's fees for having to file a motion to compel in a discovery dispute in the case, and on July 28, 2014, Corizon was dismissed from the suit upon agreement of the parties.

The company had announced its intention to withdraw from its $76.5 million contract with the VDOC effective October 1, 2014, citing costs as a factor. Armor will resume medical care in Virginia prisons at that time on an interim basis; as Corizon will no longer be subject to declaratory or injunctive relief, it was dismissed as a defendant.

A motion to certify a class in the case remains pending, and a jury trial is scheduled for December 1, 2014. See: Scott v. Clarke, U.S.D.C. (W.D. Va.), Case No. 3:12-cv-00036-NKM.

Prison and Jail Phone Reforms Needed in New Jersey

by Karina Wilkinson

TWO PRISON PHONE SERVICE PROVIDERS, Global Tel*Link and Securus, continue to overcharge prisoners and their families for calls made from prisons and jails in New Jersey. While federal regulations capped interstate (long distance) calls from correctional facilities beginning in February 2014, the State of New Jersey has allowed a grave injustice to continue by permitting companies to charge high rates and allowing county jails to accept commissions on in-state calls ranging from 50% to 70%. Such commissions amount to legal “kickbacks” that let phone companies share profits with state and local governments at the expense of those who can least afford it.

Prior to the Federal Communication Commission’s order capping interstate phone rates, charges of $.33 per minute from New Jersey state prisons and as high as $15.00 for 15-minute calls from county jails have translated to hundreds and even thousands of dollars of debt for prisoners and their families. New Jersey Advocates for Immigrant Detainees* and other advocacy groups have received reports of parents forgoing calls with their children because they couldn’t afford the cost.

“It is absolutely obscene that a private vendor can charge fees that amount to a tax on children, grandmothers and families in crisis,” wrote Assemblywoman Bonnie Watson Coleman in the Trenton Times.

Following the FCC’s order, New Jersey initially lowered phone rates in state prisons to $.19 per minute, and in early September 2014 dropped the rates a second time to $.15 per minute. The most recent contract renewal extends for three months, ending in December 2014. Although the state has lowered both in-state and interstate rates to $.15 per minute, it has not gone far enough in adopting fair and just phone charges. The state could follow New York’s example and adopt a flat rate of $.05 per minute; New York contracts with the same prison phone service provider as New Jersey, Global Tel*Link.

County jails are doing the minimum to comply with the FCC’s order. They’ve lowered interstate rates to $.21 per minute for debit and prepaid calls and $.25 per minute for collect calls, but left in place high rates and commissions for in-state calls. It is now less expensive for county jail prisoners to call outside the state than to call one town over.

As examples of some of the phone rates at local facilities, calls from jails in seven counties cost $5.50 for 15 minutes within the same area code (except local calls) and $8.50 outside the area code but still within New Jersey. Seven other counties charge $4.75 for most calls within the same area code and $7.75 outside the area code but still within the state. Out-of-state calls, meanwhile, are capped at $3.15 for debit and prepaid calls and $3.75 for collect calls. This makes no sense.

Limiting calls to family members is only one aspect of this injustice. There are around 2,200 beds in New Jersey for people detained by Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), and the majority are in county jails. These detainees are awaiting immigration hearings for which they have no guarantee of legal representation if they cannot afford it. Many must represent themselves in court, and phone calls are crucial for accessing the necessary documents and information for their cases – yet they are still subjected to high phone rates.

Within the next several months, the Board of Public Utilities is expected to vote on a petition seeking to open a process to regulate phone rates in correctional facilities and lower in-state rates at both county jails and state prisons. For more information on the petition filed by a coalition of advocacy organizations, including New Jersey Advocates for Immigrant Detainees, New York University School of Law Immigrant Rights Clinic, New Jersey Institute for Social Justice, the law firm of DLA Piper and LatinoJustice, visit www.njphonejustice.org. ■

Pretrial Detainee’s First Amendment Retaliation Claim Survives Summary Judgment

by David M. Reutter

IN A DECEMBER 26, 2013 DECISION, THE Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed a district court’s grant of summary judgment, holding that a former pretrial detainee had presented sufficient evidence that he was subjected to retaliation for filing grievances and a lawsuit.

Randy G. Spencer filed suit alleging a First Amendment claim related to his stay at the Jackson County Detention Center (JCDC) in Missouri. When he entered the JCDC in January 2005 he faced multiple charges, including tampering with a motor vehicle, assaulting a police officer, theft and resisting arrest.

Despite those charges and a prior criminal record, Spencer was approved for and assigned to the Inmate Worker Program (IWP), also known as the trustee program. The IWP not only provided special privileges such as late nights, contact visits, movies, sodas, popcorn and extra food for kitchen workers, it also paid detainees for each shift worked.

Spencer was commended by the program’s supervisor, Margo Carter. He was reentered in the IWP after completing a substance abuse treatment program, and remained in the IWP until he was released from jail. In 2006, Spencer filed a lawsuit against Carter and other JCDC employees, alleging he received inadequate medical and dental care at the facility and faced retaliation by Carter.

Spencer returned to the JCDC in October 2009 on a theft charge. He was again approved for the IWP. About 10 days later, he saw Carter and apologized for filing the lawsuit against her. After a “few seconds,” she advised him that he was being terminated from the IWP.

The next day, Spencer filed a request for administrative remedy, known as a JPO, which is required before filing a formal grievance. Carter denied his request to return to the trustee program due to his “past charges, behavior and actions.”

Spencer then filed several other JPOs and requested grievance forms from his case manager, Gale Anthony. He made repeated requests which were denied, and Anthony had him moved to another unit with “younger, aggressive inmates.” His new case manager, Brenda Williams, advised him that he “wasn’t going to get any grievance forms.” Spencer filed suit and the district court granted summary judgment to Carter, Anthony and Williams.

On appeal, the Eighth Circuit held the district court had erred, noting that “In order to demonstrate retaliation in violation of the First Amendment under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, Spencer must ‘show (1) he engaged in a protected activity, (2) the government official took adverse action against him that would chill a person of ordinary firmness from continuing in the activity, and (3) the adverse action was motivated at least in part by the exercise of the protected activity.’”

As to the claim against Carter, the appellate court wrote that she had not “explained how Spencer became disqualified from the trustee program when his record was essentially the same as when he entered it originally in 2005.” She did not claim he had a disqualifying offense, nor did she present “evidence that Spencer’s record changed between his October 2009 approval for the trustee program and his later removal from that program.” Thus, a jury could conclude his lawsuit against her was the motivating factor for his termination from the IWP.

A jury could also conclude the actions of Anthony and Williams were motivated by retaliation for Spencer’s efforts to file grievances. The Court of Appeals therefore reversed the district court’s grant of summary judgment. Following remand the defendants filed a renewed motion for summary judgment on April 22, 2014, which remains pending. See: Spencer v. Jackson County, Missouri, 738 F.3d 907 (8th Cir. 2013). ■

Alaska Filing Fee Statute Denies Prisoners Court Access

by Mark Wilson

ON DECEMBER 6, 2013, THE ALASKA Supreme Court held that barring an indigent prisoner from filing an appeal due to inability to pay the filing fee deprived him of his fundamental right of access to the courts.

In May 2011, Alaska prisoner James Barber was found in violation of prison rules and placed in segregation. He appealed the violation to the superior court, requesting a partial filing fee exemption under AS 09.19.010 due to his indigency. The superior court granted a partial exemption and reduced the filing fee to $33.86, to be paid within 30 days.

AS 09.19.010 specifies that prisoners “must pay a full court filing fee before commencing litigation against the State. But the statute allows a court to exempt part of the filing fee if the prisoner demonstrates exceptional circumstances.”

In September 2011, Barber was found guilty of a second disciplinary violation and again put in segregation. He also attempted to challenge that order in superior court, seeking a partial filing fee exemption due to his inability to pay. The superior court again set the filing fee at $33.86, due within 30 days.

When Barber failed to pay, the superior court dismissed both actions. He then appealed to the Alaska Supreme Court, arguing that the prisoner litigation filing fee statute deprived him of access to the courts. The Supreme Court asked the Alaska Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers to appear as amicus curiae in support of Barber’s position.

The Court observed that it had “recited the proposition that ‘an inmate’s right of unfettered access to the courts is as fundamental a right as any other he may hold. All other rights ... are illusory without it,’” citing Mathis v. Sauser, 942 P.2d 1117 (Alaska 1997) (quoting Adams v. Carlson, 488 F.2d 619 (7th Cir. 1973)).

Analyzing Barber’s court access claim as an issue of procedural due process, the Supreme Court applied the balancing test of Matthews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319 (1976) and concluded, following an extensive analysis, that “as applied to prisoners in Barber’s circumstances, AS 09.19.010 denies adequate procedural due process.”

“Although the state may have a legitimate interest in reducing frivolous prisoner litigation,” the Court wrote, “due process cannot allow that interest to be furthered by barring an individual prisoner’s court access because of an actual inability to pay.” The dismissals of Barber’s appeals were reversed and the case remanded for further proceedings. See: Barber v. Alaska DOC, 314 P.3d 58 (Alaska 2013). ■

California: Federal Judge Certifies Class-Action Over SHU Placement, Conditions

by Derek Gilna

CALIFORNIA STATE PRISON OFFICIALS could be forgiven for complaining that the federal courts spend a lot of time monitoring their activities, but the facts indicate that such attention is warranted. California’s prison system, already singled out by the U.S. Supreme Court for overcrowding and court-ordered population reductions, is currently under additional scrutiny for constitutional violations in the Security Housing Unit (SHU) at Pelican Bay State Prison.

A lawsuit filed by the Center for Constitutional Rights on behalf of ten prisoners who have spent at least ten years in the SHU at Pelican Bay alleges that prolonged SHU confinement constitutes cruel and inhumane punishment.

According to Alexis Agathocleous, one of the attorneys representing the plaintiffs, “Since their 2011 hunger strikes, hundreds of prisoners at the Pelican Bay SHU – and across California – have stood together in solidarity to protest inhumane conditions and broken policies they’ve been subjected to for decades. This case has always been about the constitutional violations suffered by all prisoners at the SHU...”

The federal judge hearing the case of Ashker v. Brown apparently agreed, and on June 2, 2014 certified the lawsuit as a class-action for all similarly situated prisoners held in Pelican Bay’s SHU.

The prisoners’ tactic of engaging in hunger strikes, uncommon in U.S. prisons, has focused attention on what prisoners’ rights advocates argue have been long-term problems in California’s prison system. [See: PLN, Aug. 2013, p.18; July 2012, p.32].

Following an expansive investigation, Amnesty International (AI) issued a 63-page report in September 2012, concluding that SHU conditions “breach international standards on humane treatment.” The SHU at Pelican Bay is intentionally designed to “minimize human contact and reduce visual stimulation,” the report stated.

The district court noted that “Plaintiffs allege that SHU inmates live in almost total isolation. They spend at least twenty-two and a half hours per day in windowless, concrete cells with perforated steel doors and typically leave only to shower or exercise alone in an enclosed pen.”

According to the AI report, “Under California regulations, SHU is intended for prisoners whose conduct endangers the safety of others or the security of the institution.” Yet two-thirds of SHU prisoners are serving “indeterminate” terms in segregation – not due to violent behavior but because they have been “validated” by prison authorities as gang members or associates. [See: PLN, May 2014, p.30; Dec. 2013, p.40].

The arbitrariness of such isolation practices has led to an average stay in Pelican Bay’s SHU of 6.8 years, AI stated. At least 500 prisoners have spent more than 10 years in solitary confinement, where the conditions “would crush you” according to Tess Murphy, an Amnesty observer who toured Pelican Bay. Disturbingly, nearly 60 prisoners have been held in the SHU for over 20 years, many of them since the facility first opened in 1989.

Now these practices will be subjected to judicial scrutiny in the latest of a long line of federal lawsuits that have mined a seemingly endless vein of questionable conditions of confinement that have exacted an immense cost in unnecessary human suffering in California's prison system.

Although there have been recent efforts by state prison officials to review SHU placements and move certain SHU prisoners into a "step down" program, such efforts have been criticized as inadequate. As of June 9, 2014, prison officials had conducted 828 SHU reviews, resulting in 557 prisoners being moved to general population and 231 placed in various levels of the step down program. Five of the original plaintiffs in Ashker have been removed from SHU confinement.

In its class certification order, the district court certified two classes, one consisting of "all inmates who are assigned to an indeterminate term at the Pelican Bay SHU on the basis of gang validation..." and the other of "all inmates who are now, or will be in the future, assigned to the Pelican Bay SHU for a period of more than ten continuous years." Prisoners held in SHUs at other facilities are not included.

The court also assigned five of the original named plaintiffs who remain at Pelican Bay to serve as class representatives, and denied a motion by the California Correctional Peace Officers Association (CCPOA) to intervene in the case. See: Ashker v. Brown, U.S.D.C. (N.D. Cal.), Case No. 4:09-cv-05796-CW; 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 75347 (N.D. Cal. June 2, 2014).

In a related matter, a bill that would have required certain reforms in SHUs in California prisons, SB892, died in the state legislature in late August 2014. For example, the bill would have allowed SHU prisoners to have photographs and make phone calls if they maintained good behavior for three months. Fears that Governor Jerry Brown would veto the legislation contributed to its demise.

"I became convinced that to get a bill signed into law would require further weakening it to a point where it could no longer accomplish its goals," said state Senator Loni Hancock.

Thus, it appears that changes in SHU practices will have to be accomplished through the courts, as California lawmakers lack the political will to do so. ■

$8.15 Million Jury Award for Prisoner's Death at New York Jail

by David Reutter

A NEW YORK CITY JURY AWARDED $8.15 million to the estate of a prisoner who died after being denied access to medical care.

While incarcerated in 1996 at the Vernon C. Bain Correctional Center, part of the Rikers Island complex, Jose Santiago, 25, told a guard he was experiencing symptoms that included a rapid heartbeat, profuse perspiration and difficulty breathing. The guard dismissed Santiago's request for treatment at the facility's clinic.

Just 30 minutes later, moments before he collapsed, Santiago again approached the same guard who again refused to help him. Santiago's pulse could not be detected when medical staff arrived, so they started CPR and summoned emergency medical technicians. The emergency responders did not arrive until 30 minutes later, and pronounced Santiago dead after their life-saving efforts failed.

Following his October 24, 1996 death, Santiago's estate, represented by a public administrator, sued the City of New York and the city's Department of Correction.

The estate's emergency medical expert, Rachael L. Waldron, opined that Santiago's symptoms were caused by atrial fibrillation. She said his symptoms indicated he was receiving insufficient oxygen and his heart could have been stabilized with simple defibrillation, which was available in the jail's clinic but not utilized.

Waldron also opined that medical staff failed to properly administer CPR and delayed treatment by not directing the emergency technicians to Santiago's location. She concluded that Santiago's death was due to lack of proper medical care.

During the litigation, the trial court sanctioned the defendants for failing to exchange information in discovery.

Santiago's death left his 4-year-old son and 2-year-old daughter without a father. The case went to trial in June 2013, and after ten days the jury unanimously found that employees at the jail were negligent.

The jurors awarded $150,000 for past loss of household services and $200,000 for economic losses; $4 million was awarded to Santiago's daughter and $3.8 million to his son for loss of parental guidance. The estate was represented by attorney Michael

J. Kuharski. See: Rodriguez v. City of New York, Bronx Supreme Court (NY), Case No. 24068/98. ■

Tenth Circuit Holds "Consensual" Sex Defeats Prisoner's Eighth Amendment Claim

by Mark Wilson

THE TENTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS has held that a female prisoner's "consensual" sex with two guards did not violate the Eighth Amendment.

Stacey Graham was housed in solitary confinement at a jail in Logan County, Oklahoma. Between July and October 2009, jail guard Rahmel Jefferies began talking to Graham over the intercom and their discussions soon became sexual. They also exchanged sexually explicit notes. "I look forward to fucking you," Graham wrote in one note. "Damn, just the thought of that gets my nipples hard. I'm such a nympho!" She also flashed her breasts at Jefferies "for the hell of it."

On October 7, 2009, another jailer, Alexander Mendez, called Graham over the intercom, "asked about her sexual fantasies" and told her about his. "She responded that her fantasy was to 'be with two men at the same time.'... He asked who she would like him to bring. She said, 'Bring Jefferies.'" Graham then agreed to allow Mendez to see her naked when he came by her cell.

During the early morning hours of October 9, 2009, Jefferies and Mendez entered Graham's cell. She "was wearing just her T-shirt. Mendez took it off and Ms. Graham kissed Jefferies.... it was then 'back and forth' between the two men, and both had their hands on her. Jefferies began to have intercourse with Ms. Graham while she simultaneously performed oral sex on Mendez. The two men then switched positions...."

Another prisoner later alerted the assistant jail administrator that something was going on between Graham and the guards. Graham eventually admitted to having consensual sex with Mendez and Jefferies, but said she "didn't really want Mendez there."

Both guards were immediately terminated after they admitted to the sex acts. Graham was transferred to a different facility, where she told a psychologist that two guards had raped her. She "had a history of bipolar disorder and sexual abuse," but neither Jefferies nor Mendez was aware of her mental health issues.

Graham filed suit in federal court, alleging that the sexual encounter with Mendez and Jefferies violated her rights under the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants, "holding that 'in light of the consensual sexual activity at issue in this case,' there was no Eighth Amendment violation."

The Tenth Circuit affirmed on December 20, 2013, noting that Graham, unsurprisingly, focused "not on whether she consented as a factual matter but on whether a prisoner can legally consent to sex with one of her custodians." The Court of Appeals declined to hold that consensual sex in this context violates the Eighth Amendment.

The Court observed that "it is a matter of first impression in this circuit whether consent can be a defense to an Eighth Amendment claim based on sexual acts." It then noted that other courts had split on the issue, and the Ninth Circuit had recently "adopted a middle ground in Wood v. Beauclair, 692 F.3d 1041 (9th Cir. 2012)," creating "a rebuttable presumption of nonconsent." [See: PLN, March 2014, p.54].

"Even were we to adopt the same presumption as the Ninth Circuit," the appellate court wrote, in Graham's case "the presumption against consent would be overcome by the overwhelming evidence of consent." See: Graham v. Sheriff of Logan County, 741 F.3d 1118 (10th Cir. 2013). ■

Colorado Law Grants Immunity to Law Enforcement Officers Transporting Juveniles

by David M. Reutter

THE COLORADO SUPREME COURT HELD on January 13, 2014 that “allegations of negligence alone are not sufficient to overcome the statutory grant of immunity and the presumption of good faith afforded to law enforcement officers” under section 19-2-508(7), C.R.S. (2013) – a statute that pertains to officers who transport juveniles.

The Court’s ruling vacated a trial court’s order denying a motion to dismiss on immunity grounds in a lawsuit filed against the Jefferson County Sheriff and Deputy John Hodges. While transporting juveniles Daniel Larson and Dylan Bucy on July 28, 2010 from a court hearing to the Mount View Youth Services Center, a collision occurred between the transport van and a car that failed to yield when Deputy Hodges pulled into an intersection.

Larson and Bucy were injured. They filed suit, alleging that Hodges had acted negligently by failing to secure their seatbelts while they were handcuffed and by driving into the intersection without ensuring it was clear. After the trial court denied the defendants’ motion to dismiss, the Colorado Supreme Court granted review.

Under section 19-2-508(7), it “shall be presumed” that law enforcement officers “acting under the direction of the court who in good faith transport[] any juvenile” are entitled to immunity for civil or criminal liability.

The trial court found that immunity under the statute did not apply because there was sufficient evidence to “infer that Hodges failed to act in faithfulness to his duty or obligation to secure the [juveniles] and accordingly did not transport the [juveniles] in good faith.”

The Supreme Court held that if negligence alone were sufficient to rebut the presumption of good faith, “the immunity afforded by section 19-2-508(7) would be gutted because law enforcement officers would have to demonstrate a complete lack of negligence – meaning they would not be liable in the first place – in order to receive immunity.”

The Court therefore concluded “that allegations of negligence alone are not sufficient to overcome the immunity and the presumption of good faith provided by section 19-2-508(7). To hold otherwise would impermissibly defile the legislature’s attempt to immunize qualifying law enforcement officers from liability.” See: Young v. Jefferson County, 2014 CO 1, 318 P.3d 458 (Colo. 2014). ■

Jail Video Visitation Proposal Considered in Dallas County, Texas

ON SEPTEMBER 9, 2014, THE DALLAS County Commissioners Court unanimously rejected a proposal that would have ended all face-to-face visits with prisoners at the Dallas County Jail. The Commissioners Court had been considering bids to equip the jail with a video visitation system. Prison phone service provider Securus Technologies appeared to have the edge on the contract; however, when the company submitted a plan that included the elimination of in-person visits at the jail, it met vigorous opposition from County Judge Clay Jenkins.

Judge Jenkins’ outspoken rejection of the plan was a rallying cry for a number of prisoners’ rights advocates, including Texas CURE, former state Rep. Terri Hodge and Richard Miles, a former Texas prisoner who was exonerated following a wrongful murder conviction. The Commissioners Court also received hundreds of emails and a petition with over 2,000 signatures objecting to Securus’ video visitation plan.

The company’s proposal included charging $10 for each 20-minute visit, and tried to sweeten the deal by offering the county a 25% commission on video visitation revenue. The Commissioners Court initially decided to table the issue and allow previous bidders to submit new bids based on revised criteria. Any new bids would be required to 1) retain in-person visits with prisoners, 2) eliminate commissions on video visitation and 3) clarify various details including the number of video visitation terminals that would be installed.

“It is a way to make money ... off the backs of families,” said Judge Jenkins. “I am very pleased with the court today in looking at these commissions and saying that they want to get out of the commission business.”

However, in late September, due to legal concerns, the Commissioners Court renewed contract negotiations with Securus to provide video visitation at the Dallas County Jail. The county will require the continuation of in-person visits and will not accept commissions from video visitation revenue. The contract with Securus may also extend to phone services at the jail, which currently include commission payments. In 2013, Dallas County reportedly received $2.8 million in phone commissions – a practice that has also drawn criticism.

“It is very important that we do not profit on the backs of inmates in the jail,” stated Commissioner Elba Garcia.

For years, PLN has reported on the nationwide epidemic of price gouging by prison and jail phone companies like Securus and Global Tel*Link. [See, e.g.: PLN, Dec. 2013, p.1; April 2011, p.1]. Those companies, and a growing number of other firms, are increasingly extending their commission-based business model to video visitation. [See: PLN, March 2014, p.50].

California Exhaustion Requirement Extends to Independent Contractors

by Mark Wilson

ON DECEMBER 6, 2013, THE CALIFORNIA Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District, held that prisoners must exhaust administrative remedies before suing independent contractors employed by the prison system.

California prisoner Ira Don Parthemore was examined by Dr. Peter R. Col, an optometrist under contract at the Mule Creek State Prison.

Col diagnosed Parthemore with cataracts in both eyes and advised him that he would need surgery. Col later re-examined him and concluded surgery was not necessary. Col prepared a transfer request, incorrectly identifying Parthemore as being “legally blind.” He was then transferred to a medical facility.

A different optometrist examined Parthemore and found that he “never should have been diagnosed as legally blind or transferred to the medical facility.”

Parthemore fell while at the medical facility, breaking his right kneecap and several bones in his left shoulder. After he recovered, he was sent back to Mule Creek.

Parthemore sued Dr. Col in state court for negligence, alleging that the injuries from his fall were caused by Col’s refusal to issue a new eyeglasses prescription. He also alleged that Col intentionally falsified official medical records, resulting in his unnecessary transfer to the medical facility.

Col moved to dismiss, arguing that Parthemore had not exhausted his administrative remedies concerning the claims alleged in his complaint; Parthemore, in turn, argued that exhaustion was not required under the Government Claims Act, Gov. Code § 810 et seq., because Col was an independent contractor and not a government employee. The trial court agreed with Col and dismissed the lawsuit.

The Court of Appeal affirmed, finding that Parthemore did not exhaust administrative remedies. It then observed that California prisoners must exhaust “any policy, decision, action, condition, or omission by the department or its staff.” The word “staff” was intended to be defined “as broadly as possible,” the appellate court concluded. As such, it includes “independent contractors, like defendant, who are retained by the department to provide services on its behalf.”

The Court of Appeal concluded that “plaintiff’s obligation to exhaust the administrative remedies available to prisoners concerning the medical treatment they receive is independent of the obligation to comply with the Government Claims Act.”

Parthemore sought review by the California Supreme Court, which was denied on March 12, 2014. See: Parthemore v. Col, 221 Cal. App. 4th 1372 (Cal. App. 3d Dist. 2013), review denied.

Former Wyoming Probation Officer Receives, Violates Probation

by Derek Gilna

A FORMER WYOMING DEPARTMENT of Corrections probation officer was placed on probation herself following her conviction on drug and theft charges.

Ruby Maddox, 36, was enrolled in a rehabilitation center to address her addiction to prescription medication as part of a plea agreement after she admitted to stealing drugs from probationers she was responsible for supervising. She was also charged with stealing a puppy from a probationer and taking money from a charity event.

Maddox received probation plus a suspended prison sentence of three-to-five years in April 2013 after pleading guilty to one felony count of possession of a controlled substance and four counts of petty larceny.

During her initial three-year term of supervised probation, Maddox was ordered to complete a program at the Casper Re-Entry Center. Maddox has Graves' disease, an autoimmune disorder; she was admitted in mid-2013 to Wyoming Recovery for addiction to painkillers.

"A person can get in trouble with it before you know it," her attorney, Tom Smith, said about his client's abuse of prescription drugs.

Maddox was initially arrested in October 2012 following an investigation by the Natrona County Sheriff's Office and the Wyoming Department of Corrections' internal affairs office. Two women probationers supervised by Maddox told investigators how their prescription painkillers turned up missing after she "accidentally" spilled them on the floor.

One woman, who had told Maddox that she was prescribed hydrocodone for dental pain, thought it strange that her pills went missing after a visit by her probation officer.

The same probationer also accused Maddox of stealing her puppy. She told investigators the former probation officer convinced her that the puppy was unsuitable for her and she had to give it away. When she agreed, Maddox took possession of the puppy and said she had found a new home for the dog. That new home turned out to be Maddox's own, an investigator later discovered, and the puppy was returned to its original owner.

A second probationer also reported missing prescription painkillers after Maddox visited her home. Additionally, prosecutors charged Maddox with stealing money she had collected from co-workers for a fundraising event and keeping it for her own use.

When imposing probation and the suspended prison sentence, Natrona County District Judge Catherine Wilking said Maddox had damaged the public's trust by using her position with the Wyoming Department of Corrections to serve her own purposes.

"Without faith and fidelity in the probation and parole system, nothing works in the judicial system," Wilking stated.

"She has abused a position of trust in this community," added Natrona County District Attorney Michael Blonigen. "She had power over these people, and she exploited them."

In May 2013, Maddox was terminated from the Casper Re-Entry Center for violating her probation by taking more than her regular amount of prescription medication. She was arrested due to the violation, but later reinstated on a new three-year probation term. ■

Ninth Circuit: Exhaustion Prior to Amended Complaint Satisfies PLRA

by Mark Wilson

ON JANUARY 14, 2014, THE NINTH Circuit Court of Appeals held that claims raised in an amended complaint satisfy administrative exhaustion requirements under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) if they are exhausted before the amended complaint is filed.

On December 4, 2007, Arizona prisoner Erineo Cano filed suit alleging that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to his mental illness and risk of committing suicide. He then moved to submit a first amended complaint, asserting religious diet and court access claims that arose before the original complaint was filed.

Although Cano had exhausted the new claims before seeking to file his amended complaint, prison officials moved to dismiss them, arguing that the PLRA's exhaustion requirement, 42 U.S.C. § 1997e(a), requires exhaustion of all claims before an action is filed. The district court agreed, and since Cano did not exhaust until after the initial complaint was filed, his amended claims were dismissed.

The Ninth Circuit reversed, noting it had recently held "that a prisoner may file an amended complaint and add new claims where the additional cause of action arose after the initial filing, as long as he has exhausted administrative remedies as to those additional claims before filing the amended" complaint. See: Rhodes v. Robinson, 621 F.3d 1002 (9th Cir. 2010) [PLN, May 2012, p.28] and Akhtar v. Mesa, 698 F.3d 1202 (9th Cir. 2012) [PLN, Dec. 2013, p.42]. Cano presented "a slightly different factual situation," however, in that his amended claims arose prior to his initial complaint but were exhausted before filing the amended complaint.

"Following the logic of Rhodes and Akhtar," the appellate court held "that claims that arose as a cause of action prior to the filing of the initial complaint may be added to a complaint via an amendment, as long as they are administratively exhausted prior to the amendment." The Ninth Circuit also affirmed the district court's dismissal of Cano's claim related to mental health care.

Cano has since been released from prison, and the case remains pending on remand. See: Cano v. Taylor, 739 F.3d 1214 (9th Cir. 2014). ■

Fifth Circuit Holds Louisiana Commutation Changes Not Ex Post Facto

by Matt Clarke

IN AN OPINION FILED MAY 21, 2013, THE Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals held that changes to commutation laws and rules in Louisiana, which gave the pardons board the authority to deny a hearing on commutation and increased the amount of time before a prisoner could reapply for commutation, did not violate the constitutional prohibition against ex post facto laws.

Robert Howard, a Louisiana state prisoner sentenced to life in 1968, has served over forty years. Life-sentenced prisoners in Louisiana are not eligible for parole; to become eligible, a prisoner serving life must first have his sentence commuted to a fixed number of years.

At the time of Howard's offense, the rules of the Board of Pardons allowed a prisoner to reapply for a pardon or commutation one year after the previous board action. At that time, the governor could grant commutations based upon the recommendation of two of the following officials: the lieutenant governor, attorney general and trial court judge.

A revised state constitution enacted in 1974 created a new Board of Pardons; the governor could only grant pardons upon the board's recommendation. Later changes in state law mandated a five-year period between commutation applications. Subsequent changes in board rules allowed the board to refuse to grant a hearing on an application for commutation, and those changes were applied to Howard to deny him a hearing.

Howard filed a federal civil rights action against the governor and Board of Pardons members, alleging that applying the changes in the laws and rules violated the ex post facto clause by creating a significant risk of increasing the length of his incarceration. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants and Howard appealed.

Assuming arguendo that the ex post facto clause applies to changes in commutation procedures, the Fifth Circuit held that the changes in question resulted in only an attenuated and speculative chance of increasing Howard's length of incarceration. The Court of Appeals noted that being granted a hearing did not mean Howard would receive a favorable recommendation, as he had had hearings in the past in which such a recommendation was denied.

Further, a favorable recommendation did not mean he would receive a commutation, as he had been favorably recommended previously to three different governors, none of whom granted commutation. Finally, being granted commutation would not mean that he would then be paroled; it would only make him eligible for parole. Thus, it was extremely speculative that the commutation changes created a significant risk of increasing Howard's incarceration, and consequently they did not constitute ex post facto violations.

The judgment of the district court was affirmed. Howard petitioned the U.S. Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari, which was denied in November 2013. See: Howard v. Clark, 719 F.3d 350 (5th Cir. 2013), cert. denied. ■

Second Circuit: Spraying with Feces Not De Minimis Injury; $7,000 Settlement After Remand

by Mark Wilson

THE SECOND CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS held on December 20, 2013 that spraying a prisoner with a mixture of feces, vinegar and oil is not a de minimis injury.

New York state prisoner John Hogan was confined at the Attica Correctional Facility on February 14, 2009 when he claimed three guards with their faces concealed by brown paper bags sprayed vinegar, feces and machine oil on his body and in his mouth, eyes and nose in retaliation for his having reported several other staff assaults. As a result, he suffered recurring eye and skin problems plus significant psychological harm.

On May 5, 2009, Hogan filed suit in federal court against several named and John Doe guards. Despite numerous discovery and public records requests over a three-year period, he was unable to identify the guards who sprayed him.

Pursuant to FRCP 12(b)(6) and 12(c), the defendants moved to dismiss Hogan's claims against only the named guards in his complaint. The Attorney General's office expressly stated the motion was not brought on behalf of any John Doe defendants. Nevertheless, the district court dismissed the action in its entirety, and denied Hogan's pending discovery motions as moot.

The district court concluded "that spraying a person with feces and vinegar was a de minimis use of force and not of a sort repugnant to the conscience of mankind."

The Second Circuit disagreed, holding that Hogan had stated a cognizable Eighth Amendment claim. The appellate court was "unwilling to accept, as a matter of law, the proposition that spraying an inmate with a mixture of feces, vinegar, and machine oil constitutes a de minimis use of force." In fact, such an abusive action "in the circumstances alleged here is undoubtedly 'repugnant to the conscience of mankind' and therefore violates the Eighth Amendment."

The Court of Appeals also rejected the defendants' argument that expiration of the statute of limitations barred Hogan from amending his complaint on remand to name the Doe defendants.

The Court found that under FRCP 15(c)(1)(A), the John Doe claims related back to the date the initial complaint was filed, because New York Civil Practice Law and Rules § 1024 permits such substitutions nunc pro tunc.

Thus, the Second Circuit concluded that Hogan's Doe claims were not time-barred, and he should be allowed to continue his efforts to identify those defendants and be granted leave to amend to name any unknown defendants he is able to identify. The appellate court further suggested that it may be helpful for the district court to appoint counsel to assist Hogan "in pursuing the necessary discovery, drafting any appropriate amendments to the complaint, and prosecuting his claim." See: Hogan v. Fischer, 738 F.3d 509 (2d Cir. 2013).

Following remand, the case settled on September 12, 2014 for $7,000 with no admission of liability by the defendants. Hogan litigated the case pro se, including on appeal. ■

Ninth Circuit Revives Ad Seg 24-Hour Lighting Claim

by Mark Wilson

ON JANUARY 16, 2014, THE NINTH Circuit Court of Appeals reversed a summary judgment order dismissing a prisoner's claim related to 24-hour lighting in a segregation cell.

While incarcerated at the Airway Heights Corrections Center, Washington prisoner Neil Grenning was placed in administrative segregation (ad seg) for thirteen days "pending investigation" of his alleged involvement in a fight. Ad seg cells are lit by three four-foot-long fluorescent light tubes. Prisoners can turn off two of the tubes, but one remains illuminated at all times.

Grenning stated in a grievance that he could not sleep and suffered headaches due to the constant lighting. When prison officials refused his request to replace the tube with something that produced less light, he filed suit. He alleged that the continuous lighting violated the Eighth Amendment because "the light was so bright he could not sleep, even with 'four layers of towel wrapped around his eyes.'" Grenning also claimed "that the lighting gave him 'recurring migraine headaches' and that he could not distinguish between night and day in the cell." He said the light caused him pain and disorientation.

The district court granted summary judgment to the defendant prison officials, holding that Grenning had not established an Eighth Amendment violation.

The Ninth Circuit reversed. The appellate court first rejected the defendants' argument that Grenning's claims were barred by the "physical injury" requirement of the Prison Litigation Reform Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1997e(e).

Citing Oliver v. Keller, 289 F.3d 623 (9th Cir. 2002) [PLN, April 2003, p.24], the Court of Appeals noted that § 1997e(e) applies only to claims of mental and emotional injury. "This section does not bar Grenning's case," the Court held, "because he does not seek recovery for 'mental or emotional injury.'"

The Ninth Circuit then observed it had previously "held that continuous lighting can satisfy the objective" prong of a deliberate indifference claim, and that issues of fact as to how bright the light was, its effect on Grenning and whether prison officials were deliberately indifferent precluded summary judgment. Further, the appellate court rejected the defendants' argument that Airway Heights was accredited by the American Correctional Association and complied with ACA standards for cell lighting.

Noting that qualified immunity had not been addressed, the Court of Appeals left that issue "for the district court to determine in the first instance on remand."

Additionally, Grenning was allowed to proceed in forma pauperis and the district court withheld 20% of his prison wages to pay court fees pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1915(b). The Ninth Circuit also granted Grenning in forma pauperis status on appeal, and another 20% of his funds was withheld to pay the appellate filing fee.

Relying on Torres v. O'Quinn, 612 F.3d 237 (4th Cir. 2010), Grenning asked the Ninth Circuit to cap the total fee withholdings at 20% under "a method called the 'sequential' or 'per prisoner' approach." The defendants argued that 40% was proper under "a method termed the 'simultaneous' or 'per case' approach." The appellate court declined to decide the issue, however, directing the lower court to consider it on remand.

This case remains pending before the district court, with Grenning now represented by counsel. See: Grenning v. Miller-Stout, 739 F.3d 1235 (9th Cir. 2014). ■

Seventh Circuit Extends Appeal Filing Deadline for Prisoner Misled by Court Clerk

by Matt Clarke

IN A WELL-CRAFTED OPINION DELIVERED on August 8, 2013, the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals held that a prisoner who was misled by a court clerk regarding the status of his habeas corpus petition should be allowed to appeal the district court's ruling despite his notice of appeal being filed more than two years after the petition was decided.

Michael Carter, an Illinois state prisoner, filed a petition for writ of habeas corpus in federal court pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2254. The district court denied the petition on February 10, 2011 but failed to make a separate judgment or send a copy of the opinion to Carter. On December 5, 2011, Carter wrote to the court clerk inquiring about the status of his petition. The clerk responded that no action had been taken and he would be promptly notified by mail when an order was entered. About a year later, Carter contacted the clerk again. This time he was informed of the judgment in a letter received on March 22, 2013.

Carter filed a notice of appeal less than a month later. The appellate court, in screening new filings for possible jurisdictional problems, noticed the length of time between the judgment and notice of appeal.

The Seventh Circuit held that because the district court had failed to issue a separate judgment pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 58(c)(2), the judgment would not be considered rendered until 150 days after the denial of the petition was entered on the docket. A petitioner who did not receive actual notice of the denial would then have 180 days to request reopening of the case in order to file a notice of appeal. The 150 days added to the 180 days would have brought the filing date up to January 7, 2012, about a month after Carter had been erroneously informed by the court clerk that his petition was still pending. Thus, had the clerk not misled him, he could have reopened the case and filed a timely notice of appeal.

The time for filing a notice of appeal is not subject to equitable tolling, "the judge-made doctrine, well established in federal common law, that excuses an untimely filing when the plaintiff could not, despite the exercise of reasonable diligence, have discovered all of the information he needed in order to be able to file his claim on time." However, equitable tolling can be applied to the 150-day period, and it was in the interest of justice to do so since the clerk had misled Carter and "[h]e could not, considering his situation as a prisoner without legal sophistication or a lawyer, have learned this essential information earlier."

Therefore, the Court of Appeals tolled the 150-day period until March 22, 2013, when Carter learned of the judgment. This made his notice of appeal timely and the appellate court therefore declined to dismiss his appeal. See: Carter v. Hodge, 726 F.3d 917 (7th Cir. 2013). ■

Colorado: Sentencing Court May Override Sexually Violent Predator Risk Assessment Score

by Matt Clarke

THE COLORADO SUPREME COURT HAS held that a sentencing court may designate a person convicted of a sexual offense a Sexually Violent Predator (SVP) even if a risk assessment instrument (screening instrument) indicates that the person is unlikely to commit another sex offense. However, the sentencing court must make specific findings on the record to demonstrate the necessity of the SVP designation.

Brandon David Allen, a Colorado state prisoner, pleaded guilty to first-degree sexual assault and other charges related to breaking into his neighbor's home, grabbing her by the throat, threatening to kill her and repeatedly raping her. After the trial court sentenced him to 20 years to life in prison, it considered whether he should be designated an SVP.

Under § 18-3-212.5(1)(a), C.R.S. (2012), an offender who was at least 18 years old at the time of committing an enumerated sexual offense against a stranger or victim with whom the offender established a relationship primarily for the purpose of sexual victimization, and is likely to recidivate based on the results of the screening instrument, can be designated an SVP. A Sex Offender Management Board (SOMB)-trained evaluator administers and scores the screening instrument, then provides the result to the trial court.

The score, which ranges from one to ten, indicates the likelihood of recidivism. It is based upon ten indicators, six of which pertain to the offender's background and four that relate to the crime, acceptance of responsibility and degree of sexual deviancy. The only indicator scored against Allen related to admitting the crime, which he claimed not to remember.

The evaluator scored Allen as a one – below the threshold of being likely to reoffend. However, the trial court re-scored the screening instrument, determined that Allen was likely to recidivate and designated him as an SVP. Allen appealed. The Court of Appeals affirmed, and Allen's petition for review was granted.

The en banc Colorado Supreme Court held that the trial court should not have re-scored the screening instrument, but should have substantially deferred to it. Further, if a trial court deviates from the results of the scored screening instrument, it must make "specific findings on the record to demonstrate the necessity of the deviation."

The Supreme Court then examined the record and held that Allen's likely "deviant sexual fantasies," difficulty with relationships, threatening to kill the victim to avoid punishment, denial of the crime and two prior incidents in which women sought restraining orders against him made it likely that he would reoffend. Therefore, his designation as an SVP was upheld. See: Allen v. People, 2013 CO 44, 307 P.3d 1102 (Colo. 2013). ■

Seventh Circuit Upholds Dismissal of Illinois Booking Fee Challenge

by Mark Wilson

IN JANUARY 2014, THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT Court of Appeals upheld the dismissal of a challenge to a jail's booking fee policy.

The Village of Woodridge, Illinois imposes a $30 booking fee on any person who is arrested and taken into custody. The fee is collected without any hearing, or opportunity to challenge the deprivation or seek reimbursement.

On January 8, 2011, Jerry G. Markadonatos was arrested and booked into jail. He paid the $30 booking fee and was given a receipt, but was not afforded a hearing or any other opportunity to challenge the fee.

After Markadonatos successfully completed a period of supervised release, he was adjudicated "not guilty." Despite this favorable resolution the booking fee was not refunded and he was denied an opportunity to seek reimbursement.

Markadonatos filed suit on behalf of himself and all arrestees who were charged the booking fee, alleging that the fee violates procedural and substantive due process. The district court dismissed the action for failure to state a claim.

The Seventh Circuit affirmed. Applying the balancing test in Matthews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319 (1976), the Court of Appeals concluded "that the district court was correct in holding that Mr. Markadonatos cannot state a procedural due process violation based upon Woodridge's booking fee ordinance." The Court reasoned that "the risk of an erroneous deprivation" was "practically non-existent," and "additional safeguards would not in any way reduce the risk thereof."

The appellate court also held that Markadonatos was unable to climb the "steep hill" of proving that collection of the booking fee "shocks the conscience." The Seventh Circuit ultimately concluded "that Woodridge's booking fee does not violate Mr. Markadonatos' right to substantive due process" because no fundamental right was implicated and the fee was rational and not arbitrarily imposed. Accordingly, the district court's order of dismissal was affirmed.

One judge dissented, likening the defense of the booking fee to the Queen of Hearts' philosophy of "sentence first, verdict afterwards" in Alice in Wonderland, and to the doublespeak of George Orwell's 1984, "where language is used to mean the opposite of reality."

"This should be a simple case," the lengthy dissent suggested. "The village's 'booking fee' ordinance is unconstitutional on its face. It takes property from all arrestees – the guilty and innocent alike – without due process of law." See: Markadonatos v. Village of Woodridge, 739 F.3d 984 (7th Cir. 2014).

The dismissal of the case was upheld in a divided en banc Seventh Circuit opinion on July 21, 2014, with five judges voting to affirm the district court, four voting to reverse and one voting to remand with instructions to dismiss due to lack of standing. See: Markadonatos v. Woodridge, 2014 U.S. App. LEXIS 13856 (7th Cir. 2014). ■

Fighting the High Cost of Prison and Jail Phone Calls!

The Human Rights Defense Center (HRDC) has been reporting on the high cost of telephone calls from prisons, jails and other detention facilities in the U.S. for over two decades in its monthly publication Prison Legal News. An award of funds from the settlement in Judd v. AT&T, a prison phone-related lawsuit, has allowed us to launch the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign (WA PPJ). The goal of the campaign is to eliminate the kickbacks paid by telephone companies to detention facilities and to regulate the exorbitant rates charged to prisoners, their families and others who accept prison phone calls, including attorneys. Video visitation, which is following closely on the same path as the prison phone industry, has also been incorporated into the campaign.

HRDC co-founded the national Prison Phone Justice Campaign in 2011, which resulted in a historic vote by the FCC in August 2013 that capped the rates for interstate (long distance) prison phone calls at $.25/minute for collect calls and $.21/minute for debit and prepaid calls. Those rate caps became effective on February 11, 2014. While this has helped millions of families stay connected across state lines, it did nothing for prisoners incarcerated in Washington State who make local and intrastate (in-state) calls, estimated by the FCC to constitute 85% of all prison and jail calls.

Studies show that a prisoner's ability to communicate with family and friends while incarcerated results in a smoother transition upon release and reduces recidivism. However, excessive phone rates hamper and sometimes eliminate the ability of prisoners to stay in touch with their loved ones.

We need everyone affected by this issue, including prisoners' family members and attorneys, to sign on to the WA PPJ Campaign and tell us how they have been impacted by high prison and jail phone rates. This can be done by accessing the Campaign's website: www.wappj.org. Testimonials and video can be uploaded to the site, or people can call 1-877-410-4863 to record their comments. Or comments can be written and mailed to: HRDC, Attn: WA PPJ Campaign, P.O. Box 1151, Lake Worth, FL 33460. We also need billing records from prepaid accounts (2012 to current) for phone calls received from detention facilities, to demonstrate the actual rates charged to recipients of the calls. Billing records can be emailed to: cwilkinson@humanrightsdefensecenter.org.

Lastly, any donations to fund the campaign are both needed and appreciated; donations can be made at www.prisonphonejustice.org. Only with your support will we be able to end the abusively high costs of prison and jail phone calls in Washington State. Thank you for your support, and please tell others about the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign and encourage them to join!

ICE Implements New Directive to Limit Solitary Confinement

CIVIL RIGHTS AND IMMIGRATION ADVOCACY groups are watching closely to see the results of a change in federal policy governing the placement of immigrant detainees in solitary confinement, which was implemented one year following the release of a damning report on that issue.

Immediately after the policy was adopted by Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) on September 4, 2013, the American Civil Liberties Union pledged to “closely monitor the implementation of the new directive,” which the ACLU cautiously hailed as a step in the right direction toward ending segregation and solitary confinement for immigrant detainees.

“The new ICE directive sets a good example for the prison system writ large when it comes to monitoring the use of solitary confinement,” Ruthie Epstein, an ACLU legislative policy analyst, said in a written statement.

“If strictly enforced throughout the ICE detention system – including at county jails and contract facilities – ICE’s new policy could represent significant progress in curtailing this inhumane practice,” she added, noting the directive “sets important limits on the use of solitary confinement. Solitary confinement in both immigration detention and the criminal justice system is cruel, expensive, and ineffective.”

The policy change reflects a commitment by former Homeland Security Secretary Janet Napolitano to review ICE’s segregation practices in the wake of a joint study by two human rights organizations that reported immigrant detainees were increasingly placed into solitary confinement in jails and detention centers simply because they were mentally ill, due to their sexual orientation or because they could not speak English.

The Heartland Alliance’s National Immigrant Justice Center and Physicians for Human Rights stated in a September 2012 report that conditions for immigrant detainees placed in isolation not only endangered their health and safety, but also pressured them “to abandon their options for legal relief, their families, their communities, and often the only country they have ever known.”

According to the report, the immigrant detainee population grew 85% between 2005 and 2012, as ICE annually imprisoned 400,000 detainees. The report cited the dramatic increase for creating the “fastest-growing incarceration system” in the nation, with nearly 250 state and local facilities – not including detention centers operated by ICE or private contractors – holding immigrant detainees alongside criminal offenders.

Traditionally, the purpose of immigration detention has been not to punish detainees for allegedly violating immigration laws, but to ensure their appearance at court hearings. Yet the report found an alarmingly high number of immigrants were placed in solitary confinement or 23-hour lockdown, where they were deprived of exercise, proper nutrition and human contact.

In a review of local jails that contract with ICE, the report found solitary confinement policies to be “inappropriately punitive,” arbitrary and unjust. “This severe form of segregation, especially when it is used for long periods of time,” the report stated, “is rarely necessary to achieve order in a jail or detention facility.”

The study cited multiple examples of immigrant detainees who were placed in segregation or isolation solely because they belonged to “vulnerable populations,” such as being gay, bisexual, transgender or mentally ill.

In southern California’s Ventura County Jail, for example, guards segregated “obvious alternative lifestyle inmates.” The Washoe County Jail in Nevada had a policy that explicitly stated detainees with “overt homosexual tendencies” were to be placed in administrative segregation, while a jail in Cobb County, Georgia called for the segregation of “gender challenged” prisoners who demonstrate “past or current ... passive-aggressive behavior.”

In other facilities, guards justified using segregation and solitary confinement to “discriminate against non-English-speaking immigrants,” the report found. Failure to speak English “when able,” or watching Spanish channels on television, could lead to 23-hour lockdown at the Nobles County Jail in Minnesota, where English is the “primary” language “to ensure the safety and security of the facility.”

The report also found that many jails punished immigrant detainees for violating trivial rules, such as putting their feet on tables or singing loudly. Detainees at the Stewart Detention Center in Georgia stated they were placed in segregation because they complained about the quality of the drinking water. Two detainees in York County, Pennsylvania – who each had cellmates serving criminal sentences – said they were segregated because they didn’t notice that their identification wristbands had come off.

A victim of domestic violence who was detained for almost a year at the McHenry County Correctional Facility in Illinois while her visa application was pending was placed in disciplinary segregation on separate occasions for having an extra blanket, bra and pair of socks; for placing a shampoo bottle on her windowsill; and for having newspaper articles in her cell.

And in the Washoe County Jail, detainees must work to avoid isolation, according to the facility’s policy manual. Commissary, library access and visitation are privileges that have to be “earned” by working at the facility, the manual states. Refusing to work results in “lockdown and failure to earn any privileges.”

The National Immigrant Justice Center and Physicians for Human Rights report also found that solitary confinement was sometimes applied to immigrant detainees “in lieu of mental health treatment.” Qualified mental health staff is “rarely on-site” at immigration detention centers, despite “extremely high rates of anxiety, depression, and PTSD (Post Traumatic Stress Disorder) symptoms among detainees.”

The report further noted that while detainees already struggle to understand why they’ve been incarcerated for allegedly violating immigration laws, “the further deprivation of liberty inherent in segregation and solitary confinement might be reasonably expected to compound the psychological stress of detention.”

The report called on ICE to end the use of segregation and solitary confinement in immigration detention centers by not contracting with jails or jail-like facilities, and by “placing vulnerable individuals in alternatives to detention (ATD) programs” or releasing them on humanitarian parole. The report also called on Congress to reduce funding for immigration detention and instead enact “binding civil detention standards so that facilities that detain immigrants can be held legally accountable for improper use of segregation and solitary confinement.”

As a result of the firestorm of media coverage generated by the report, a year later ICE announced a new policy that jails and detention centers are required to follow when holding immigrant detainees in solitary confinement.

“Placement of detainees in segregated housing is a serious step that requires careful consideration of alternatives,” the policy states. “Placement in segregation should occur only when necessary and in compliance with applicable detention standards.” Additionally, “placement in administrative segregation due to a special vulnerability should be used only as a last resort and when no other viable housing options exist.”

In issuing the new directive, ICE pledged to “ensure the safety, health and welfare of detainees in segregated housing in its immigration detention facilities,” and to quickly review cases involving detainees in vulnerable groups who are held in solitary “for over 14 days” or placed in segregation “for any length of time in the case of detainees for whom heightened concerns exist based on known special vulnerabilities and other factors related to the detainee’s health or the risk of victimization.”

Those vulnerable groups include detainees with mental illnesses and severe medical conditions or disabilities, pregnant or nursing women, the elderly, and anyone who might be susceptible to harm due to their sexual orientation, gender identity or because they have been victims of sexual assault.

The National Immigrant Justice Center and Physicians for Human Rights faulted the new ICE policy, however, for not eliminating entirely the use of extended solitary confinement, nor allowing independent, third-party oversight of the policy’s implementation and enforcement.

The U.S. Senate also acted in the aftermath of the report, in the form of an amendment to an immigration reform bill that placed further restrictions on the use of segregation and solitary confinement for immigrant detainees. The bill, S.744, passed the Senate but the U.S. House of Representatives has failed to act on the legislation. ■

“Ban the Box” Movement Spreads Nationwide

by Joe Watson

PRISONER ADVOCACY GROUPS ARE HAILING recent successes in “Ban the Box” campaigns to remove questions related to criminal records from employment applications, and say they hope to expand the movement even further as momentum grows to help ex-offenders find jobs.

San Francisco became the first city in the nation to adopt a Ban the Box policy that includes private employers and affordable housing, when Mayor Ed Lee signed the Fair Chance Ordinance on March 4, 2014. The law bars private companies with more than 20 employees, contractors that hold city contracts worth more than $5,000 and any residential building that has received city funding from asking about a potential applicant’s criminal history prior to conducting a job interview or reviewing a housing application.

“Ban the Box” is the catchphrase coined by All of Us or None, a San Francisco-based advocacy organization composed of formerly-incarcerated people and their families, founded in 2003. It refers to the question on job applications, usually accompanied by a check-box, that asks whether an applicant has a criminal history.

Employers can still ask about convictions later in the hiring process and deny job offers based on criminal records, but removing the question from job applications allows ex-prisoners to get their foot in the employment door. During subsequent interviews they can explain their criminal history, how they have changed and why they should be hired.

Under San Francisco’s new law, employers are also required to consider whether a job applicant’s conviction is relevant to the position they are seeking, how long ago the conviction occurred and any evidence the applicant can provide of rehabilitation.

“San Francisco now has the distinguished honor of being the first legislative body in the country to protect its citizens from discrimination based on their conviction history in both private employment and affordable housing,” wrote attorney Noah Frigault, with the San Francisco Human Rights Commission.

In passing the ordinance, the city’s Board of Supervisors demonstrated its determination to deal with what it saw as a worsening issue. “In San Francisco, as across the country, individuals are often plagued by old or minor arrest or conviction records.... The problems presented by employers and housing providers who use a person’s criminal history to deny that person employment or housing opportunities are growing rather than diminishing,” the Board stated.

The Fair Chance Ordinance came on the heels of a law signed by California Governor Jerry Brown that prohibits taxpayer-funded public employers in the state from rejecting prospective job-seekers who have criminal records without first considering the applicants’ qualifications for the position.

Effective July 1, 2014, California Assembly Bill 218 requires more than 6,000 local and regional public agencies – all local governments in the state – to remove the check-box question on job applications that asks “Have you ever been convicted of a felony?” The National Employment Law Project (NELP), an advocacy group for low-wage workers, estimates that about 7 million people in California have an arrest or conviction record.

“The Legislature finds and declares,” states the bill, written by Assemblyman Roger Dickinson, “that reducing barriers to employment for people who have previously offended, and decreasing unemployment in communities with concentrated numbers of people who have previously offended, are matters of statewide concern.”

Exempting public safety jobs, such as law enforcement officers, AB 218 also requires government agencies to delay criminal background checks until after determining that an applicant meets the job qualification requirements.

“The problem of people with criminal records is at a critical point,” said Michelle Rodriguez, a staff attorney with NELP. “We have huge numbers of people who can’t get work and at the same time more and more people who have gone through the criminal justice system.”

Having AB 218 signed into law “was really huge for us, an extremely important victory,” stated Dorsey Nunn, director of the San Francisco-based Legal Services for Prisoners with Children, and co-founder of All of Us or None. “At issue is the question of ‘how do formerly incarcerated people get back into society?’ For someone who is a former prisoner, the law has said it is okay to be three-quarters of a human being once you’ve been convicted of a crime. We’re asking for equal access. For fairness.”

Rodriguez hopes the Ban the Box movement will grow through the rest of 2014 and beyond. “This issue has really resonated with so many groups on the ground across a wide spectrum – it’s absolutely magnetic,” she said.

“This year, we’ll focus on what else we can do to build on the momentum,” Rodriguez added. “How can we rope in private employers in California, and identify other opportunities? Unions, for instance, were a huge part of this effort, and there are a lot of other criminal justice workforce-related issues they can be helpful with.”

AB 218 codifies an executive order establishing the new hiring practices that was first issued by former Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger in 2010. According to NELP, 13 states and almost 70 cities and counties have enacted similar legislation as of September 2014, including Hawaii, which adopted the first Ban the Box law 16 years ago. [See: PLN, Sept. 2011, p.32].

In May 2013, Minnesota Governor Mark Dayton signed into law a statute prohibiting private as well as public employers from asking about job-seekers’ criminal records until the first interview. The state of Maryland adopted similar legislation in May 2013, and the governor of Illinois, Pat Quinn, issued an executive order removing the question concerning background checks from applications for state employment.

Other states with Ban the Box statutes include Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Massachusetts, Nebraska, New Mexico and Rhode Island. Some states extend Ban the Box to private employers, while in others the law only applies to government agencies.

Most recently, New Jersey enacted the Opportunity to Compete Act on August 11, 2014, which will become effective in March 2015. The law applies to businesses with 15 or more employees, and places restrictions on when employers can ask about job applicants’ criminal records, such as on job applications and during an initial interview. Employers that violate the law are subject to civil penalties.

Various versions of Ban the Box legislation were unsuccessfully introduced in 2013 and 2014 in ten other states, including Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Michigan, New Hampshire, North Carolina, Ohio, South Carolina, Virginia and Washington.

Cities that have enacted Ban the Box policies include Philadelphia, Baltimore, Seattle, Memphis, Cleveland, New York City, Minneapolis, Detroit, Boston, Chicago, New Orleans, Tampa, Newark, Portland and most recently Washington, D.C. in September 2014.

Advocates believe the Ban the Box movement can also prompt private companies to change their hiring practices with respect to ex-offenders. As examples they point to the nation's largest retailer, Wal-Mart, which removed questions about criminal history from initial job applications in 2010, and Minneapolis-based retailer Target, which adopted a Ban the Box policy effective January 2014.

"Target is finally doing the right thing by reforming its hiring policies so that qualified job applicants aren't automatically screened out simply because they have an arrest or conviction from the past," said NELP executive director Christine Owens. "Other large retailers around the nation need to follow suit, because their hiring policies send a strong message about whether they are committed to the communities that support their business."

According to the Star Tribune, Greta Bergstrom, communications director for TakeAction Minnesota, noted that Target had changed its hiring policy following "a 200-person public action in the lobby of Target's headquarters, a hundred individuals with past records filing job applications at Target and being rejected, a visit to Target's shareholder meeting and numerous meetings, e-mails and phone calls with Target executives."

"That's why they decided to make this change," she said.

Groups that advocate for former prisoners believe that eliminating questions about criminal records – or pushing background checks until later in the hiring process – are essential to helping people released from prisons and jails succeed in reintegrating into society, thereby reducing recidivism rates. Little research exists as to the results of implementing Ban the Box policies, though there are anecdotal examples of the positive effects.

"There are many employers who knowingly will not hire someone with a criminal record," noted Walter Boyd, executive director of St. Leonard's Ministries in Chicago, a re-entry program that provides released prisoners with free counseling, food, housing and classes.

Victor Gaskins, St. Leonard's program director, agreed. "You fill out that application, you get that box, and if you check it: 'Yes, I've been arrested, or incarcerated,' the person doing the hiring for the job, as soon as he sees that check, he throws [your application] in the garbage."

Advocates acknowledge that extending Ban the Box to other states and cities will take time, and caution against expecting too much too soon. "Our work isn't a sprint, it's a long haul fight," Dorsey Nunn admitted. "Limiting access to jobs and housing not only victimizes formerly incarcerated people, but also generations and generations of children and grandchildren. We don't have the luxury of stopping."

Currently, there are efforts to get the federal government to Ban the Box on initial job applications for federal employment; the U.S. government has around 2.7 million employees, excluding the military – about 2% of the nation's workforce. President Obama has the authority to change federal hiring policies through an executive order.

PLN has previously reported on guidance issued to employers in 2012 by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission in regard to job applicants with criminal records and criminal background checks. [See: PLN, Feb. 2014, p.40; June 2012, p.20].

In formal comments submitted to the EEOC, Prison Legal News wrote it is important to "remove barriers to reentry for ex-offenders, including barriers to employment... [to ensure] that former prisoners do not face discrimination in the job market due solely to the fact of their criminal record alone when that record has no relationship to or bearing on the job position they are seeking."

Not everyone is in favor of Ban the Box policies, though. "A blanket ban-the-box policy doesn't make good business sense for small business," stated Elizabeth Milito with the National Federation of Independent Business, while Chambers of Commerce in some states have expressed concerns about liability risks for businesses that hire former prisoners. ■

Pennsylvania Activists Arrested for Protesting Construction of New Prison Complex

SEVERN MEMBERS OF DECARCERATE PA, a grassroots coalition working to end mass incarceration in Pennsylvania, were arrested while protesting the construction of a new two-prison complex in that state. The protest was to highlight the $400 million cost to build the facilities, which could be better spent on schools.

To make that point, the protestors set up 10 school-style desks with apples and notebooks across the entrance to the construction site for the prisons, which is on the grounds of SCI Graterford. They also set up a mock schoolhouse in what they said was the “first-ever act of civil disobedience to block prison construction in Pennsylvania.”

The November 19, 2012 protest began at 6:40 AM. It was short-lived, as the protestors were arrested about an hour later after they ignored orders by the State Police to disperse. They were charged with defiant trespass, failure of disorderly persons to disperse upon official order and persistent disorderly conduct. Following arraignment, they were released on bail.

The seven protestors, all from Philadelphia, were Layne Mullett, 27; Jenna Peters-Golden, 27; Leana Cabral, 29; Erica Slaymaker, 23; Sean Damon, 35; David Fisher, 41; and Robin Markle, 26. Other protestors at the event were not arrested.

“Prisons do not make our communities safer,” said Cabral. “Prisons break up families and ruin people’s lives. Education, employment, housing and health care make communities safer, yet our governor prioritizes the construction of new prisons over these basic rights. I took part in this action because I believe powerful things happen when people come together and organize.”

It was hoped the protest would bring public attention to the $400 million being spent to build the new prison complex, designated SCI Phoenix I and II, which will house approximately 4,100 prisoners and is expected to open in 2015.

The new prisons represent “an expansion of mass incarceration in Pennsylvania and a continuation of policies that lock people up instead of giving our communities the resources they need to thrive,” Decarcerate PA wrote in a statement. “The money used to build these prisons is money that is being stolen from our schools, our healthcare, reentry programs, social services, and the environment.”

“I believe that it will take more such actions by all those who understand that building more prisons is not the solution to addressing the issues in our communities and this society,” said Hakim Ali, with Decarcerate PA and Reconstruction, Inc. “We will need everyone to stand up against oppression and let our voices be heard.”

According to a December 5, 2013 article in the Philadelphia City Paper, the state’s projected cost savings from opening SCI Phoenix and closing SCI Graterford were based on “an analysis, purportedly using data from 2007, that is superficial, unclearly sourced and woefully out of date.”

“They’re definitely misleading people about the costs of this prison expansion,” stated Decarcerate PA member Owen Lyman-Schmidt. “We have to ask: If they’re not building these prisons to save us money, as they claim, why are they building them?”

A Decarcerate PA spokesperson told Prison Legal News that the seven protestors who were arrested have not yet gone to trial or accepted plea bargains. They are represented by attorneys Michael Lee and Leo Mulvihill.

New Mexico Guard Sues Over Termination for Medical Marijuana Use

A FORMER NEW MEXICO JAIL GUARD and veteran of the Iraq war is suing the county where he was employed after being fired for a positive drug test, even though he had a prescription to use medical marijuana to treat his Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD).

Augustine Stanley, 32, was terminated from his job as a lieutenant at the Metropolitan Detention Center (MDC) in Albuquerque after testing positive for marijuana in 2013. But his lawyer, who is representing him in a federal lawsuit against Bernalillo County, said he was prescribed medical marijuana for PTSD and has a legal medical marijuana card.

“It’s demonstrative of a lot of people’s cases,” said Stanley’s attorney, Paul Livingston. “And a lot of people work for the state or the county or the city and need to have or want to have a medical marijuana card.”

Jail officials claimed it was a violation of MDC’s anti-drug policy for an employee to use marijuana. They added that Stanley did not report any prescription medication prior to the drug test as required by policy.

However, Livingston said Stanley did not have to report his medical marijuana prescription because New Mexico state law recognizes the medical use of marijuana and protects the privacy of medical marijuana card holders.

“They guarantee him confidentiality, and what’s ironic is then they give him a test that’s designed to break that confidentiality to show that he is using marijuana and therefore can be fired, and that’s what’s wrong with this,” Livingston said.

MDC officials argued that any drug use is inappropriate due to the safety sensitive environment at the jail. Guards need to be “100% aware” because life and death situations could happen very quickly, noted then-MDC Chief Ramon Rustin.

In response, Livingston contended that simply using medical marijuana does not automatically mean the user’s judgment or abilities are impaired.

“They’re not impaired in any way, the only thing that impairs them is the drug test that says they’re impaired and the conclusion or the presumption that the government makes, which is that if you test positive for marijuana you must be impaired,” he said.

In Stanley’s termination letter, a jail official wrote that his “actions and conduct were inappropriate, unprofessional and inconsistent with your obligations as a Bernalillo County employee.”

MDC spokeswoman Nataura Powdrell insisted that Stanley was fired because he did not notify his supervisor about his use of a controlled substance, not due to the medical marijuana itself. “He’s a lieutenant, and he understands the policy and should have informed his supervisor,” she said.

The jail’s policy states that “No employee shall ingest any controlled substance unless prescribed directly to them. When taking any prescribed medication ... [an] employee must notify their immediate supervisor when taking any prescribed medication that may impair their ability to perform the essential functions of their job or may cause the employee to be inattentive or drowsy.”

Stanley countered that his work performance was not impaired because he smokes medical marijuana off duty and before bed; thus, he was not obligated to inform his supervisor what he was doing on his own time.

The case raises serious questions for other prison and jail guards, as well as police officers, fire fighters and federal, state, county and city employees who are authorized to use medical marijuana but must also undergo random drug testing.

“It seems that it is not appropriate under state law because the State of New Mexico has recognized the right of patients to use medical cannabis for various reasons, in consultation with their doctor and under their doctor’s supervision,” said attorney John McCall, who helped write New Mexico’s medical marijuana statute. “People are going to have to consult with lawyers, unfortunately.”

Stanley began working as a guard at MDC in 1999 and, after serving in the military, was promoted to sergeant in 2006 and then to lieutenant. He was a member of the jail’s Corrections Emergency Response and Tactical Team, and said his record at the facility was unblemished.

“I served my country, and I served my county,” Stanley stated. “But it feels like that meant nothing. It feels wrong.”

His federal lawsuit, filed on June 13, 2014, remains pending. See: Stanley v. County of Bernalillo, U.S.D.C. (D. N.M.), Case No. 1:14-cv-00550-JB-KBM. ■

Fifth Circuit Declares SORNA Unconstitutional in Certain Cases, Reversed by Supreme Court

by Matt Clarke

THE FULL FIFTH CIRCUIT COURT OF Appeals held in July 2012 that Congress did not have the power to enact criminal penalties for failing to register as a sex offender following an intrastate move, as applied to a defendant who had been unconditionally released from a federal prison sentence and military service prior to the enactment of the registration law. Thus, the Court declared the Sex Offender Registration and Notification Act (SORNA) and accompanying statutes and rules, 42 U.S.C. § 16913, 18 U.S.C. § 2250(a) and 28 C.F.R. § 72.3, unconstitutional under those narrow circumstances. The Supreme Court disagreed, however, and reversed the appellate ruling.

In 1999, Anthony James Kebodeaux, 21, was in the military when he was convicted of having sex with a fifteen-year-old girl and sentenced to three months in prison. After serving his sentence, he was no longer in the military; his release from both prison and military service was unconditional.

SORNA requires all federal sex offenders to register with state registration authorities within three days of moving. Texas law requires registration within seven days of moving. When Kebodeaux failed to register his move from San Antonio to El Paso within three days, he was charged, convicted and sentenced to 366 days in federal prison. He appealed.

A panel of the Fifth Circuit upheld his conviction but the en banc court reversed, finding that application of SORNA under those circumstances exceeded Congress' authority. The appellate court held that, "[a]bsent some jurisdictional hook not present here, Congress has no Article I power to require a former federal sex offender to register an intrastate change of address after he has served his sentence and has already been unconditionally released from prison."

In a lengthy opinion, the Fifth Circuit held that SORNA, as applied in this case, did not "rationally relate" or "reasonably adapt" to one of the powers of Congress set forth in the Constitution. The application of SORNA was novel and did not reasonably extend well-established laws; it also did not properly account for state interests and was too sweeping, or at least too broad.

Noting that "[t]he Department of Justice cannot find a single authority, from more than two hundred years of precedent, for the proposition that it can reassert jurisdiction over someone it had long ago unconditionally released from custody just because he once committed a federal crime," the Court of Appeals held that Congress had no power to do so under the Necessary and Proper Clause of Article I of the Constitution.

Congress also lacked authority under the Commerce Clause, as an intrastate move by a federal sex offender did not affect interstate commerce. The panel opinion had held that a sex offender might drop off the radar by making an intrastate move prior to making an interstate move, but the Fifth Circuit noted that if the reasoning of the panel was adopted, "it would confer on the federal government plenary power to regulate all criminal activity," including those areas traditionally reserved to the states.

"Neither this court nor the Supreme Court, however, has ever extended Congress's 'police power' over those who use the channels of interstate commerce to punish those who are not presently using them, but might do so," the Court of Appeals wrote.

Therefore, the appellate court reversed Kebodeaux's conviction and ordered the dismissal of the charges against him, with the decision based in part on the fact that he had been released from federal prison prior to SORNA's enactment. See: United States v. Kebodeaux, 687 F.3d 232 (5th Cir. 2012).

The U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari, then reversed the Fifth Circuit's ruling in a split decision in June 2013. The Court held "that the SORNA changes as applied to Kebodeaux fall within the scope [of] Congress' authority under the Military Regulation and Necessary and Proper Clauses," and remanded the case. Accordingly, after remand, the Court of Appeals affirmed Kebodeaux's conviction on August 13, 2013. See: United States v. Kebodeaux, 133 S.Ct. 2496 (2013). ■

California Prison Healthcare Costs Soar Under Federal Receiver

CREATING A BALANCE BETWEEN adequate healthcare for prisoners at a reasonable and affordable cost for taxpayers is at the heart of a debate being argued in legislative offices and behind prison walls in California.

The federal receiver appointed to overhaul the state's prison healthcare says he has worked hard to reform a dysfunctional system that – at its worst in 2005 – claimed the life of one prisoner per week due to negligence, malfeasance or inadequate and substandard medical care. [See: PLN, March 2006, p.1].

State officials counter that the reforms have produced a "Cadillac" level of care that has caused medical costs to skyrocket, nearly doubling over the past decade. Statistics indicate, for example, that partly as a result of healthcare costs, California now spends more per year housing a state prisoner than it does to educate a child in public school.

When a federal district court assumed oversight of the state's prison healthcare system and appointed a receiver in 2006 – initially Robert Sillen, who was replaced by J. Clark Kelso in 2008 – the court gave the receiver's office the authority to hire medical staff and set their pay levels. [See: PLN, July 2008, p.30]. Immediately after being appointed, the receiver set out to bring medical care in California prisons up to constitutional standards.

To cure the prison system's many problems, the receiver's office, known as California Correctional Health Care Services, hired hundreds of employees to fill longtime vacancies, increased salaries and created new positions at higher pay rates. The number of medical, mental health and dental workers in state prisons increased from 5,100 in 2005 to 12,200 in 2011.

"The problem that we had is that the receiver was not accountable to anybody," complained former state Senator George Runner. "So the receiver could just do or choose to spend whatever amount of money he thought was necessary to solve his problem, and unfortunately, now the state is stuck with that."

Runner neglected to mention that it was the state's decades-long failure to address problems related to deficient prison medical care, largely due to a lack of political will by the legislature in which he served, that led to the Plata and Coleman class-action lawsuits which in turn resulted in the appointment of the receiver and a federal court order to substantially reduce the state's prison population. [See: PLN, July 2011, p.1].

California spent $1.1 billion in fiscal year 2003-04 to provide medical care to the state prison population, which peaked at around 160,000. Under California's realignment initiative, which went into effect in 2011, the number of in-state prisoners has fallen to approximately 127,200. Yet the projected cost of prison healthcare in fiscal year 2013-14 was expected to top $2 billion – an 82.3% increase compared to a decade ago after adjusting for inflation.

In contrast, spending for each public school student in the state grew just 17.9% during the same time period.

"We incarcerate people in California at a rate higher than any other society in the world, including Russia and Iran," noted Michael Bien, an attorney who represents prisoners in the still-pending Plata and Coleman cases. "One of the things we have to pay for is healthcare. Doctors and nurses only [work] in these places if you pay them."

A survey of salaries for prison physicians found that only Texas has a base salary higher than California's. An analysis of 2011 California payroll data by the Associated Press indicated that of the top 100 highest-paid state employees outside the University of California system, 44 worked in state prisons.

The highest paid prison medical employees in 2013 included staff psychiatrist Rajababu Kurre, who earned $509,000; Hung V. Do, a chief physician and surgeon, who made $439,000; and physician and surgeon Dev Khatri, who received $431,000.

Since 2005, the average cost of prison healthcare in California has soared from $7,747 per prisoner annually to more than $18,000. Governor Jerry Brown has criticized Kelso's efforts to improve medical care in the state's prison system, calling it "Cadillac care." Kelso countered that prisons only provide "minimally necessary medical care." Of course, most prisoners would also likely dispute the notion that they receive Cadillac medical treatment; rather, it is more of a Chevy Cavalier level of care.

Kelso also pointed out that the state had failed to act in the wake of the expiration of a court order that increased prison healthcare workers' salaries. At that point, the state was free to collectively bargain with the union representing the employees.

Joyce Hayhoe, a spokeswoman for the receiver's office, added that contract medical service costs have dropped over the past several years and are now less than when the receiver was appointed. The state has reduced by half the cost of outside medical care at hospitals by having prison doctors provide more treatment, which also reduces transportation costs and the expense of having guards watch prisoners while they are hospitalized.

Although prison medical costs remain high, that is part of the cost of mass incarceration. When public officials enact laws and policies that put more people in prison for longer periods of time, higher costs – including medical expenses – are a predictable result. ■

Probe Reveals Corruption at Pennsylvania Jail

A FORMER GUARD AT PENNSYLVANIA'S Erie County Prison and his supervisor, who is also his wife, were accepted into a special diversion program for first-time offenders after being charged in connection with payroll tampering and missing ammunition. Another guard was demoted following an investigation into misconduct at the facility.

Sgt. Daniel S. Danowski, 41, and his supervisor and wife, Capt. Leslie L. Danowski, 40, were fired in October 2012 after being charged in a scheme that netted Daniel Danowski nearly $3,500 in pay he did not earn.

Jim Senyo, the deputy warden of safety and security at the Erie County Prison, was demoted and suspended without pay for five days for his involvement in a separate scheme in which Daniel Danowski sold over 400 rounds of prison ammunition to a former guard. Senyo's duties as deputy warden included overseeing the facility's armory, where the ammunition was stored.

The investigation uncovered a conspiracy between the Danowskis to falsify time-keeping records at the prison, resulting in $3,428 in payments to Daniel Danowski for work he never performed between February and July 2012.

Erie police charged Daniel Danowski with misdemeanor charges of theft by unlawful taking, receiving stolen property and criminal conspiracy to tamper with public records or information. Leslie Danowski was charged with one count of conspiracy to tamper with public records or information; she did not face charges related to the sale of the ammunition.

At a July 16, 2013 hearing, Erie County Judge Stephanie A. Domitrovich accepted the Danowskis' request to be placed in an Accelerated Rehabilitative Disposition program, which is reserved for non-violent, first-time offenders. If they successfully complete the program they can apply to have their records expunged; acceptance into the program did not require pleading guilty to the charges.

The investigation into misconduct at the prison also revealed that Leslie Danowski had signed off on the improper use of compensatory time for Capt. Jason Beasom.

Beasom "was paid as if he was at work, but he wasn't there," said Sue Ellen Pasquale, the county's accounting manager. He was ordered to repay the time, which amounted to $3,811, and also suspended – the seventh suspension at the prison since January 2012.

Erie County Chief Executive Barry Grossman promised reforms. "My administration will not tolerate the misconduct of a few individuals," he said. "It is unfortunate that the behavior of a few overshadows the hard work and dedication of so many of our dedicated prison employees."

Former deputy warden Al Copeland, a "highly respected" 32-year veteran at the facility, was named to fill Senyo's position pending a merit selection committee's decision on a permanent replacement.

The committee may also conduct an independent review of the prison's operations. One proposal under consideration was to create the position of inventory coordinator, whose duties would include keeping track of ammunition, county-issued prisoner clothing and other supplies. The position would have an annual salary of $40,584.

However, Erie County Controller Mary Schaaf, who was involved in the payroll tampering and missing ammunition investigations, opposed the idea as a waste of taxpayer money. "What we really need are honest employees doing their jobs," she said. ■

Nebraska DOC Obstructing Efforts to Modify Prisoners' Child Support Payments

EXCESSIVE ENFORCEMENT OF CHILD support obligations is not only detrimental to incarcerated parents, according to advocates in Nebraska, but also risks increasing recidivism and hindering familial relationships.

Legal Aid of Nebraska, led by managing attorney Muirne Heaney, has attempted to help prisoners modify their child support payments by offering forms and clinics on how to navigate that process. But the state's Department of Correctional Services has obstructed those efforts by prohibiting prisoners from receiving the forms provided by Heaney, saying they haven't been approved by a state attorney.

"Nobody is advocating [incarcerated parents] should be freed of their responsibility," Heaney said. "What I am advocating is that we make [child support] a collectable judgment."

At the end of 2011, Nebraska prisoners – over 4,000 men and women – owed back child support and interest of about $86 million; close to 700 had monthly child support obligations of at least $400. Many had owed back child support before they were incarcerated.

The debts are despite the enactment of a 2007 state law that made imprisonment an involuntary, rather than voluntary, circumstance with respect to child support payments once a prisoner has been incarcerated at least six months. As a result of that law, prisoners are able to apply for modification of their child support obligations while incarcerated.

Mel Beckman, editor of the Nebraska Criminal Justice Review, said he doubted that state prison officials are informing prisoners they can seek modifications, which is why Heaney offered to provide the forms and conduct the clinics.

Heaney noted that reentry is made more difficult when ex-offenders have high child support debts upon release. When and if they find jobs, they're usually low-paying positions – not including garnishment for monthly child support payments and back payments.

"It seems counter-productive to me," Heaney observed.

Byron Van Patten, child support administrator for Nebraska's Department of Health and Human Services, said it's not the state's intent to leave prisoners and ex-offenders destitute. HHS supervisors visit prisons to answer questions before prisoners are released so they are aware of their child support responsibilities.

But Heaney argued that if the state makes it hard for ex-offenders to live due to high child support debts that accrued during their incarceration, they will be incentivized to make money in other ways – including through illegal activities.

She added that non-custodial parents are sometimes ashamed of their inability to support their kids, so they simply stay away from them. As a result, those children are more likely to get into trouble, abuse drugs and alcohol, and drop out of school.

"I used to be a prosecutor," Heaney said. "I am not in favor of people committing crimes. But I am in favor of practicality. And if we want these people to return to society, and be contributing members of society, it behooves us to not erect barriers to that."

The child support modification forms that Heaney produced are still not allowed in state prisons. Legal Aid of Nebraska, which receives funding from Legal Services Corporation (LCS), a publicly-funded non-profit, cannot directly represent prisoners due to restrictions placed on LCS by Congress in 1996. ■

New York District Attorney Admits Lying About Acting in Porn Movies

AN UPSTATE NEW YORK DISTRICT Attorney who lied when questioned during his re-election campaign about being an actor in pornographic movies during the 1970s will not quit, despite public calls for his resignation and at least one expert's view that he may have violated New York State Bar Association rules.

Democratic incumbent Mark D. Suben was re-elected in 2012 as district attorney for Cortland County, near Syracuse. During the campaign he was asked whether he had acted in adult films in the 1970s, and he denied having done so.

Suben accused his Republican opponent, Keith Dayton, of spreading false rumors in a smear campaign to discredit him.

However, WSTM-TV reported on November 17, 2012 that Suben had in fact acted in pornographic movies under his real name and the pseudonym Gus Thomas. An anonymous YouTube video compared images of Suben and Thomas, and presented other evidence.

Suben then decided to come clean.

"Recently, materials have circulated alleging that I was involved in the adult film industry about 40 years ago in New York. Those allegations are true," Suben admitted in a news conference ten days after the election. "I was an actor in adult films for a short period in the early '70s. I was also an actor in other venues including off-Broadway, soap operas, and commercial advertisements."

The post-election admission led to calls for Suben's resignation, and legal expert Jonathan Turley said an "act of dishonesty used to secure a legal position" may constitute misconduct under New York State Bar Association rules.

Suben's spokeswoman, Aimee Milks, said he would not resign. "I think the situation is really irrelevant to the campaign," she said. "His record as the DA for the last four years speaks for itself."

In November 2013 it was reported that

Keith Dayton's brother, Kevin, was the person who had uncovered Suben's porn acting past, contacted the media and posted the YouTube video. Kevin Dayton said he did not reveal Suben's past out of any allegiance to his brother, as they had been estranged for many years, nor did he have a vendetta against Suben.

"He's always seemed like a good guy to me," Kevin Dayton said. "Even now, I don't necessarily think he should've resigned." He indicated the issue was hearing a public official blatantly lie.

"It was like Ronald Reagan saying, 'I wasn't in Bedtime for Bonzo,'" Kevin noted. "It was annoying that someone would lie so bluntly and run for public office."

Keith Dayton said he had no control over his brother's actions and, in any case, was unconcerned with Suben's participation in porn movies. "I think the more important part is the lying," he stated, adding he plans to run for DA again in 2016.

"It's ancient history to me," Suben said of the controversy over his appearance in adult films. "It's of no significance in my life. The issue is long since gone. It's a thing that's over, that's quite completely over as far as I can determine." ■

Investigation Uncovers Lost Graves at Former Florida Juvenile Facility

by David M. Reutter

AN ANTHROPOLOGICAL TEAM FROM THE University of South Florida investigating the grounds of the now-closed Florida Industrial School for Boys (FISB), a juvenile detention facility in Marianna, has identified the remains of three youths buried in a cemetery on the property and continues to exhume other bodies discovered at the site.

In all, the team found 55 graves – 24 of which were outside the boundaries of the marked cemetery – at the facility, which was formerly called the Arthur G. Dozier School for Boys. Researchers believe another cemetery for black youths is also located on the property.

The FISB came under scrutiny in 2008 after a group of men publicized stories about physical and sexual abuse they had endured while held at the facility as juveniles. They called themselves the “White House Boys,” after a small white building where the most serious abuses occurred. Some said they were made to lie down on a bed and severely beaten with leather straps by school officials. [See: PLN, March 2009, p.22].

“I came out of there in shock, and when they hit you, you went down a foot into the bed, and so hard, I couldn’t believe,” said Robert Straley, who was taken to the “White House” the first day he arrived at FISB in the 1960s. “I didn’t know what they were hitting you with.”

The White House Boys alleged that some juveniles at the facility who went missing were killed by staff members, and their bodies buried on the property.

Former Governor Charlie Crist ordered an investigation after the stories of abuse were made public. In 2009, the Florida Department of Law Enforcement (FDLE) issued a report that accounted for 31 graves with rusted metal crosses in a cemetery on the grounds of the facility. However, the report concluded that investigators could not substantiate or disprove the claims of abuse because too much time had passed.

Straley called the report a whitewash. “All they did was try to do their best to discredit us,” he said. “They focused on that instead of focusing on an investigation.”

The anthropological research team used ground-penetrating radar to find 31 graves in the marked cemetery plus an additional 24 graves during a four-month excavation in 2013. Some of the grave sites were under roads or in the woods, far from the cemetery.

“We found burials within the current marked cemetery, and then we found burials that extend beyond that,” said Dr. Erin Kimmerle. “These are children who came here and died, for one reason or another, and have just been lost in the woods.”

As for juveniles who reportedly went missing from the facility, “For the majority, there’s no record of what happened to them. So, they may be buried here, they may have been shipped to their families. But we don’t know,” stated Dr. Kimmerle, who is seeking approval from the Department of Juvenile Justice to locate another cemetery on the property containing the remains of black youths, which existed separately due to racial segregation at the time.

In August 2014, researchers announced that DNA and other tests were used to identify the first body exhumed from the facility’s cemetery as George Owen Smith, who was 14 when he disappeared from FISB in 1940. The tests did not reveal how he died.

School officials told Smith’s family that he had run away and died from pneumonia while hiding under a house. His family came to get his body.

“They said that the body was so decomposed, you wouldn’t be able to identify him.... they took him straight out to the school [cemetery],” said his sister, Ovell Smith Krell, 83. One of the other boys at FISB, however, had told the family a different story.

“He said, ‘My brother was running out across a field, an open field, and there were three men shooting at him with rifles,’” Ovell stated. “I believe to this day that they shot my brother that night, and I think they probably killed him and brought him back to the school to bury him.”

Ovell hopes to give her brother a proper burial. “I would take him and put him down with my mom and dad in their cemetery,” she said. “I hope I get that chance.” Families of the boys buried at FISB must seek an exhumation order in state court to obtain their remains.

In September 2014, the university team announced the identities of two more bodies buried at the facility: Thomas Varnadoe, 13, and Earl Wilson, 12.

School officials had reported that Varnadoe died in 1934, allegedly from pneumonia, while Wilson was beaten to death in 1944 while confined in a small cottage on the property known as the “sweat box.” Four other boys were eventually convicted in Wilson’s death.

Thomas Varnadoe’s brother, Richard, was five years old when Thomas was sent to FISB for stealing a typewriter. Richard Varnadoe, now 85, provided researchers with the DNA that allowed them to identify his brother’s remains.

“We got the report that he died from pneumonia. We didn’t believe that in a minute,” he said. “It’s been really bad in a way and really good in a way. It’s almost unbelievable to go back 80 years,” Varnadoe added. “I’m elated.”

The FDLE’s 2009 report said many of the graves at the former juvenile facility contained victims of a 1914 fire, while other boys had died during a 1918 flu outbreak. The FDLE blamed poorly-kept school records for being unable to determine what happened to the other youths who died. The report concluded that two boys were killed by fellow students and another was shot by a deputy sheriff while trying to escape.

Five hundred boys were housed at FISB during its peak in the 1960s. Most had been sent to the facility for minor offenses such as running away from home, skipping school and petty theft.

In 1968, then-Florida Governor Claude R. Kirk, Jr. visited the facility. He discovered cramped sleeping quarters, buckets used as toilets, no heat in the winter, leaks in the ceilings and holes in the walls.

“If one of your kids were kept in such circumstances,” Kirk said at the time, “you’d be up there with rifles.” ■

News in Brief

Alaska: On January 12, 2014, twenty-year-old detainee Jairus Nelson slipped under a garage door at the Dillingham jail and fled wearing nothing but his underwear. He ran into some nearby woods and later attempted to jump into several passing cars to evade officers. Unfortunately for Nelson, after several unsuccessful attempts to find a ride to freedom, he tried to enter the car of off-duty policeman Dan Decker. Decker recognized the escapee and held him until other officers arrived. Nelson was returned to the jail, given a new set of clothes and charged with felony escape.

Arizona: Anthony James Marotta resigned from his job as a guard at ASPC Perryville after he was allegedly caught receiving oral sex from a female prisoner in the back of a transport vehicle. Another prisoner was driving the vehicle when she witnessed the incident in the rearview mirror; she reported it to prison authorities, and Marotta was arrested on December 31, 2013. He admitted to the sex act and to an earlier incident of sexual misconduct.

Arizona: A prisoner being held on death row at the Eyman complex was found dead in his cell on January 27, 2014. According to the Pinal County Medical Examiner's Office, Gregory Dickens, 48, committed suicide. Dickens had been sentenced to death after he and an accomplice robbed and murdered a couple at a rest stop near Yuma in 1991.

Australia: Convicted drug dealer Dino Joseph Antonio Diano was mistakenly released on parole two years early and a warrant was issued for his arrest. He appealed the decision after being returned to prison, but on March 5, 2014 the Western Australia Court of Appeal ruled that his earliest release date was in May 2015. Prior to his drug conviction Diano had been a prominent businessman in Alice Springs, and hosted Prince Charles and Princess Diana at his home during their 1983 tour of Australia.

California: On January 24, 2014, a former Marine who operated a Pasadena youth boot camp was sentenced to four years and four months in state prison and will be required to register as a sex offender. Kelvin Bernard McFarland, 43, who preferred to be called "Sgt. Mac," pleaded no contest to multiple charges stemming from two cases of sexual assault involving three 14-year-old girls. McFarland's offenses included sexual assault, kidnapping, extortion, child abuse, false imprisonment, unlawful use of a badge, sexual penetration by a foreign object, oral copulation of a person under 16, lewd act on a child and unlawful sexual intercourse.

California: Christina Marie Lugo, 31, a Fresno County Superior Court clerk, was arrested on December 31, 2013 and released on bond the same day for allegedly helping jail prisoner Ricky Modesto attempt to intimidate a witness in a 2012 assault case. After Modesto bonded out on felony battery charges, he failed to appear for a court hearing; a warrant was issued and he was subsequently arrested in November 2012. Fresno County sheriff's spokesman Chris Curtice said Lugo then tried to arrange communications between Modesto and three other co-conspirators, all gang members, to intimidate a witness. Lugo and two of the co-conspirators were charged with conspiracy to dissuade a victim and the third was charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm.

Florida: Reports from the Turner Guilford Knight Correctional Center described a brawl between two prison guards on January 13, 2014 that injured a female officer who attempted to break up the fight. The internal reports, obtained by Miami-Dade TV affiliate NBC 6, said a guard identified as "R.W." became angry when asked to replace an item on a prisoner's meal tray. He first pushed the female guard, then began to physically assault another male officer, "K.A." The reports further indicated that R.W. may have been under the influence of alcohol at the time of the incident.

Florida: In the aftermath of the jail-house beating of prisoner Jody Holland in May 2013, the former commander of the DeSoto County Jail was sentenced on February 10, 2014 to three years' probation and community service. Raymond Kuglar pleaded guilty to lying to an FBI agent in an attempt to cover up the attack. Four jail guards, Cpl. Steven Rizza and deputies Vincent Carlucci, Jonathan Mause and Ashley Cross, were fired for their roles in the beating and engaging in a conspiracy to conceal the incident. Mause and Cross face pending charges, while Carlucci has been convicted.

Georgia: Zel Tirrell Mitchell, 43, a former DeKalb County jail guard, was indicted on February 27, 2014 for having sexual contact with a prisoner in exchange for food and contraband. The prisoner stated he was not forced into the encounter. Mitchell had been fired following an internal investigation; he was charged with violation of oath and sexual assault by persons with supervisory or disciplinary authority. An additional charge of indecent exposure was dropped. [See: PLN, Oct. 2013, p.56].

Greece: On January 9, 2014, U.S. State Department spokeswoman Jen Psaki told reporters that the United States was concerned about the escape of Greek prisoner Christodoulos Xiros, 56, who was serving six life sentences for acting as a hitman for the revolutionary group known as November 17. "We call on the Greek government to locate Xiros and return him to prison," Psaki said. November 17 was responsible for the deaths of 23 people, including a CIA station chief, prior to disbanding in 2002; it is still included on the State Department's list of terrorist organizations. Xiros escaped while on an eight-day New Years furlough from prison. The furlough program is now under review.

Idaho: Seanjay Wright, 36, worked as an Ada County jail guard for two years before being arrested on January 1, 2014 on two felony counts of sexual contact with a prisoner. He was booked into the same jail where he was employed after an investigation by the Boise Police Department found evidence that he had sex with a female prisoner on two occasions. Ada County Sheriff Gary Raney said Wright had "violated the trust of the community and let down the other 650 men and women working for the Sheriff's Office who take great pride in their ethical conduct."

Illinois: On January 23, 2014, Sean McGilvery, a heroin dealer who catered to St. Clair County judges, was sentenced to 10 years in prison. One of his regular customers, former judge Michael Cook, was arrested last year in an investigation that included the cocaine-related death of a fellow judge at Cook's hunting cabin. Cook pleaded guilty to federal weapons and heroin charges. On March 28, 2014, a U.S. District Court rejected Cook's plea deal of 18 months in prison and instead sentenced the disgraced judge to 24 months' incarceration.

Indiana: Prison officials dispatched to a security tower at the Miami Correctional Facility on December 23, 2013 found 56-year-old guard Zane E. Rasmussen dead of an apparent heart attack. Indiana DOC public information officer Ann Hubbard said it was believed that Rasmussen had nitroglycerin pills on hand, but was unable to reach them before he died. He was alone in the tower, and officials first suspected a problem when he failed to make an hourly welfare check call as required by prison policy.

Kansas: On January 22, 2014, Melinda Trusty, 47, pleaded no contest to having sex with a prisoner in a clinic restroom at the Lansing Correctional Facility. The former guard came under suspicion when prison officials noticed that prisoner Nathan M. Cunningham had been receiving letters that appeared to be written by an employee. In an interview, Trusty admitted to having sex with Cunningham, who had been assigned as a clinic worker. She was sentenced on March 19, 2014 to three years' probation.

Libya: Approximately 90 prisoners escaped from Mager Prison in southern Zliten on February 15, 2014. Prison guards are suspected of collusion in the escape, the latest in a series of jailbreaks over the past year in which at least 1,700 prisoners have absconded with a low rate of recapture. In July 2013, 1,200 prisoners broke out from Benghazi's Kuwaifiya Prison during a riot. Mass escapes have also occurred at the Bawabat Al-Jibs, Ajdabiya and Sebha prisons.

Louisiana: On January 6, 2014, a deputy at the Tangipahoa Parish jail was arrested before he could carry out a plan to smuggle contraband into the facility. Patrick Collins, 58, admitted to bringing in the contraband with intent to sell it to prisoners, according to Sheriff Daniel Edwards. Packages containing tobacco and marijuana were found in Collins' work space. He was charged with a single count of malfeasance in office, two counts of introduction of contraband into a penal institution and possession of Schedule 1 narcotics with intent to distribute.

Michigan: Rather than face frigid temperatures outdoors, investigators with the MDOC Absconder Recovery Unit stayed behind their desks and focused on cold cases to pass the time. Their investigation led them to the whereabouts of 60-year-old Judy Lynn Hayman, who had walked away from the Detroit House of Corrections in April 1977 – 36 years earlier. On February 17, 2014, acting on a tip from Michigan authorities, police officers in San Diego, California were able to locate Hayman and take her into custody. The investigators' victory turned to embarrassment, however, when Hayman, who had legally changed her name to Jamie Lewis, produced court documents that proved her sentence had been suspended in 1982.

Nebraska: A 15-year-old jailed on an armed robbery charge attacked and strangled Scotts Bluff County Detention Center guard Amanda Baker, 24, on February 14, 2014, killing her. The juvenile, Dylan Cardeilhac, was charged as an adult with first-degree murder; however, prosecutors later amended the charge to first-degree murder during the commission of a robbery. The state alleges that Cardeilhac killed Baker as he was trying to steal her keys during an escape attempt. Baker's family has since filed a wrongful death claim against Scotts Bluff County. In May 2014, Cardeilhac was sentenced to 8 to 15 years on the original armed robbery charge.

Nevada: An elaborate scheme was uncovered at the Washoe County Jail that involved stolen identities and fraudulent commissary accounts. KOLO TV reported on February 4, 2014 that stolen credit card information was used by outsiders to place money on prisoners' accounts, then the funds were given to the prisoners upon their release. Detectives described the fraud as "using the jail as an ATM." As part of the scheme, at least two people were purposely arrested so they could cash out the stolen funds after leaving the jail.

New Jersey: On February 28, 2014, six pretrial detainees prevailed in a court action requiring the Middlesex County jail to provide computer equipment necessary to view evidence in their cases. Prisoners at the North Brunswick facility did not have access to CD, DVD or flash drive readers, and Superior Court Judge Bradley Ferencz ordered jail officials to "address the issue, kicking or screaming or not." "E-discovery is here," Ferencz told county counsel Benjamin Leibowitz, ruling that the jail had violated prisoners' constitutional rights by preventing them from viewing all the evidence against them. The detainees were represented by the public defender's office.

New Mexico: Albuquerque Metropolitan Detention Center guard Elijah Chavez was suspended with pay in February 2014 following the release of video footage that showed him repeatedly punching prisoner Mark Palacios. Chavez stated in a report that he felt he was in "survival mode" at the time of the assault. He was not charged with any crime, but Palacios, who was also pepper sprayed, was charged with battery on a peace officer. Bernalillo County Sheriff's Office representatives said it was likely that the deputy who charged Palacios with battery did not watch the video.

New York: A love triangle involving three New York jail guards ended in a bloody confrontation on a Queens street corner on January 10, 2014. Jeffrey Ragland died after being shot by his romantic rival, Oniel Linton. The shooting occurred when Linton saw Ragland violently strike the men's paramour, Salees Sales. Linton ran to the scene of the assault and knocked Ragland to the ground, then drew his weapon and shot him twice. Linton claimed Ragland was in the process of pulling a gun on him when he opened fire. Ragland, who had recently retired from the New York City Department of Correction, was carrying a Glock 17. No charges were filed against Linton.

Ohio: On January 27, 2014, Cuyahoga County jail guard Tim Thomas was sentenced to six months in jail for accepting a bribe from a prisoner in the form of $2,000 in cash and a used car valued at $500. Thomas pleaded guilty to bribery and falsification for his role in delaying the transfer of a jail prisoner to state custody; he will serve his time in protective custody.

Oklahoma: A prisoner at the GEO Group-operated Lawton Correctional Facility made several calls to 911 on a contraband cell phone before being found unconscious on the floor of his cell. Christopher Glass, 33, was taken to a hospital where he was pronounced dead on January 30, 2014. Investigators said Glass' body had bruises and scrapes, but an autopsy report released on April 14, 2014 determined his death was caused by a methamphetamine overdose.

Oregon: On January 27, 2014, The Oregonian reported details of a prisoner's creative but unsuccessful plot to escape from the Snake River Correctional Institution. Michael J. Norwood crafted a dummy using peanut butter and his own hair, then posed the makeshift mannequin in his bunk with headphones and reading glasses to conceal his absence from his cell. Norwood had also fashioned a rope from rolls of dental floss, which he intended to use to scale security fences; however, he was captured in a prison recreation yard after being missing for only half an hour.

Philippines: A mass jailbreak occurred at the Leyte provincial jail in the town of Palo on January 30, 2014. Nearly 200 prisoners escaped around dawn, but most were recaptured within hours. It was unclear how the mass break-out occurred, though it was very clear why: Prisoners told investigators they escaped due to hunger from limited food and squalid conditions at the facility. They also complained of slow prosecutions in their cases. Each year dozens of escapes occur in the Philippines due to the dilapidated condition of the prisons and lax security.

Puerto Rico: Former prison guard Bernis Gonzalez Miranda, 27, received a 67.5-year prison sentence on January 28, 2014 for his role in providing armed security for drug dealers; he was one of 89 law enforcement officers and 44 other people arrested in an FBI undercover investigation called Operation Guard Shack. According to court testimony, Gonzalez Miranda received $2,000 each time he participated in a drug transaction. He was convicted of three counts of conspiring to possess with attempt to distribute more than 5 kilos of cocaine, plus three counts of possession of a firearm in furtherance of a drug transaction.

Tennessee: The Tennessee Bureau of Investigation confirmed on January 10, 2014 that Grainger County jailer Jacob Scott Layel, the son of the county's sheriff, was one of five former jail employees indicted on various misconduct charges following the escape of three prisoners from the facility in November 2013. The TBI conducted the investigation to identify security and operational flaws at the jail because the escape had gone unnoticed for several days. Sheriff Scott Layel, a chief deputy and one of the indicted employees were also named as defendants in an unrelated lawsuit filed by three female prisoners who said they were repeatedly raped at the jail.

Texas: On December 3, 2013, U.S. District Court Judge Andrew S. Hanen said corruption in the Cameron County legal system and judiciary was so pervasive that most people probably wouldn't believe it. On that same day, former Texas state district judge Abel C. Limas surrendered to U.S. Marshals to begin serving a six-year federal prison term for accepting bribes to render favorable rulings in civil cases. Criminal charges against 12 defendants, all members of the Cameron County legal community, were brought after Limas' misconduct was discovered. All but one were convicted.

Texas: Travis County District Attorney Rosemary Lehmberg will keep her job despite a drunk driving arrest, some bad behavior while in jail and a civil case intended to force her from office. [See: PLN, Sept. 2013, p.56]. On December 11, 2013, Judge David Peeples ruled after three days of testimony that he would not remove Lehmberg as the top felony prosecutor in Travis County. Testimony during the hearing described Lehmberg's drinking habits and medical conditions, but was not enough to convince Peeples to relieve her of her duties. The ruling ended months of speculation as to the future of Lehmberg's role in Texas' criminal justice system. On July 15, 2014, a lawsuit was filed against Lehmberg by a former state prosecutor who claimed he was fired for requesting an investigation into her actions.

Texas: On November 3, 2013, 37-year-old Sarah Tibbetts, an insulin-dependent diabetic, collapsed and died at the Irving jail. Following an investigation into her death, on January 24, 2014 two jail supervisors were fired, two guards were reprimanded and two other employees received counseling. Tibbetts' mother, who lives in California, was contacted by jail officials on November 2, 2013 and asked to bring insulin to Texas. She told them it was impossible for her to travel to the jail, but warned that her daughter would die without insulin. Sarah Tibbetts had been incarcerated at the jail previously but was taken to a hospital for treatment during prior stays at the facility.

United Kingdom: Five guards at HM Prison Parc in South Wales denied wrongdoing in an alleged drug smuggling conspiracy, and, soon afterward, a court case against them fell apart when prisoners at the facility refused to testify. A sixth defendant, Philip Finselbach, pleaded guilty to involvement in the conspiracy, which according to anonymous sources involved smuggling cell phones, marijuana and heroin. On January 16, 2014, a judge declined to sentence Finselbach, who said he had feared for the safety of himself and his family if he did not participate in the scheme. HM Prison Parc is run by a private company, G4S.

Washington: On January 31, 2014, the Christian Science Monitor reported that in an effort to reduce food disposal costs and enrich a gardening program that provides vegetables for the prison's kitchen and local food banks, the Monroe Correctional Complex has turned to vermiculture – the breeding and raising of earthworms. The program began with 200 red wigglers and has grown to a “wormery” which currently holds 5 million of the invertebrates. The worms can process 10,000 pounds of food scraps per month and the byproducts – worm manure and “worm tea” – are used as a rich fertilizer on several acres of gardens at the facility.

Wisconsin: In a Grant County courtroom on January 20, 2014, former parole officer Sherry Buswell pleaded no contest to 21 felonies related to stealing money from parolees and depositing it into her personal bank account. She faced more than 70 years in prison, but was sentenced in March 2014 to 18 months and over $8,000 in restitution. Buswell was also required to write a letter of apology to each of her victims. The thefts were discovered after a co-worker reviewed several of her cases and became suspicious due to “numerous inconsistencies.”

Prosecutorial Misconduct: Taking the Justice Out of Criminal Justice

by Christopher Zoukis

The prosecutor has more control over life, liberty, and reputation than any other person in America. His discretion is tremendous.... While the prosecutor at his best is one of the most beneficent forces in our society, when he acts from malice or other base motives, he is one of the worst.
—Former U.S. Attorney General Robert Jackson

IN A RECENT CASE BEFORE THE U.S. COURT of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, veteran judge Henry F. Floyd offered a rare public rebuke of federal prosecutors in North Carolina, who, the court found, had engaged in a pattern of misconduct.

“Mistakes happen,” Floyd wrote. “Flawless trials are desirable but rarely attainable. Nevertheless, the frequency of the ‘flubs’ committed by [the prosecutors] raises questions regarding whether the errors are fairly characterized as unintentional.”

“Yet the United States Attorney’s office in this district seems unfazed by the fact that discovery abuses violate constitutional guarantees and misrepresentations erode faith that justice is achievable,” he added. “Something must be done.”

To demonstrate the seriousness of the violations, the appellate court ordered a new trial for federal prisoner Gregory Bartko, who had been convicted in 2010 in connection with a conspiracy to sell millions of dollars in fraudulent securities. See: United States v. Bartko, 728 F.3d 327 (4th Cir. 2013), cert. denied.

As an additional sanction, the Fourth Circuit panel said it would present its concerns to U.S. Attorney General Eric Holder, who is ultimately responsible for the actions of federal prosecutors, and to the Department of Justice’s Office of Professional Responsibility.

Judging from several decades of data demonstrating there is virtually no accountability for both state and federal prosecutors, it is unlikely that the prosecutors in the Bartko case will face sanctions for their misconduct. Indeed, prosecutors appear to enjoy special dispensation for abuses committed in the pursuit of justice – few are ever held accountable or face meaningful discipline.

This article examines the pervasiveness of prosecutorial misconduct in the U.S. justice system and the broken and inadequate means of preventing and punishing such wrongdoing. Prison Legal News has reported extensively on abuses by prosecutors, which have resulted in untold numbers of compromised trials, unfair sentences and wrongful convictions.

Prevalence of Prosecutorial Misconduct

PROSECUTORIAL MISCONDUCT IS, IN THE words of noted Harvard Law School professor Alan Dershowitz, “rampant.” Due to the lack of a uniform reporting body – each state has its own attorney discipline system – the number of criminal cases affected by prosecutorial abuses is unknown. Research studies have shed some light on this subject, though.

A 2003 report by the Center for Public Integrity, a nonprofit government watchdog group, examined more than 11,400 allegations of prosecutorial misconduct in appellate rulings between 1970 and 2003. In 2,012 of those cases (17.6%), misconduct by prosecutors led to dismissals, sentence reductions or reversals. Few prosecutors, however, were sanctioned for the violations cited by the appellate courts; only 44 faced disciplinary action, and seven of those cases were dismissed.

A comprehensive 2009 study by the Northern California Innocence Project examined 707 cases in which California appellate courts found prosecutorial misconduct between 1997 and 2009. Of those cases, the misconduct in 159 was deemed “harmful.” The study noted that 67 prosecutors were found by the courts to have committed multiple infractions; however, during that time period just six were disciplined.

While most criminal cases are handled by state and local prosecutors, federal prosecutors – popularly viewed as having higher

TAKE ACTION ON PRISON PHONE RATES – CONTACT THE FCC NOW!

After nearly a decade, the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) took action in 2013 and issued an order, effective February 11, 2014, that capped the cost of interstate (long distance) prison phone rates. This led to an almost 80% decrease in interstate phone costs in some states, and those costs are now capped at $.25/minute for collect calls and $.21/minute for debit and prepaid calls. On September 25, 2014, the FCC indicated that it plans to take further action to reduce prison phone rates, including in-state (intrastate) rates – which still remain high in many jurisdictions. In fact, in-state phone rates are now higher than long distance rates in many cases.

You can submit a public comment to the FCC; even if you have sent comments before, you can resubmit them or submit new information. Please write to the FCC as soon as possible, addressing any of the following topics:

- Positive Impact of the FCC Order Reducing Interstate Calls: Let the FCC know how the rate caps on interstate prison phone calls have resulted in lower costs or helped you and your family!
- Negative Impact of Intrastate Phone Calls: While the FCC capped long distance phone rates, the order did not apply to in-state calls, which make up 85% of all calls from prisons and jails. How much do you or your family pay for in-state phone calls? The FCC needs to hear about this issue so they know why intrastate prison phone rates need to be reduced, too.
- Ancillary Fees: Do you or your family have to pay extra fees (ancillary fees) to make or accept calls, such as fees to set up, add money to or cancel a prepaid or debit prison phone account? Are you charged fees but were not told about them before they were charged? How much are these fees? Have they increased?
- Importance of Prison Phone Reforms: Tell the FCC why it is important to enact permanent reform of prison phone rates for interstate and in-state calls, including rate caps and the elimination of “commission” payments to corrections agencies. Also, the FCC needs details about fee-based video visitation services.

ethical standards – were the subject of a six-month USA Today investigation, published in 2010, that uncovered 201 cases since 1997 in which courts found that Assistant U.S. Attorneys (AUSAs) had violated laws or ethics rules. That number did not include cases involving misconduct not officially addressed by the courts, or violations handled internally. Yet only six federal prosecutors faced discipline and none were disbarred.

An August 2010 study by the Innocence Project, “Court Findings of Prosecutorial Misconduct Claims in Post-Conviction Appeals and Civil Suits Among the First 255 DNA Exoneration Cases,” found that of the 65 cases in the study “involving documented appeals and/or civil suits addressing prosecutorial misconduct, 31 (48%) resulted in court findings of error, with 18% of findings [leading] to reversals (harmful error).”

In another report published in April 2013, ProPublica, which produces independent journalism in the public interest, analyzed 30 cases where prosecutorial misconduct contributed to the vacatur of convictions between 2001 and 2011, including a number of cases in which victims of such misconduct received monetary compensation. Only one prosecutor involved in those cases faced serious discipline. That prosecutor, Claude Stuart, was forced to resign in 2002 after repeated misconduct – including withholding exculpatory evidence and lying to a judge – resulted in the reversal of multiple convictions.

According to the Center for Prosecutor Integrity, studies over the past 50 years, including some of those cited above, indicate that in 3,625 identified cases of prosecutorial misconduct, “public sanctions [were] imposed in only 63 cases – less than 2% of the time.” And of that discipline, just 14 prosecutors were suspended or disbarred. The Center maintains a national registry of prosecutorial misconduct, available at www.prosecutorintegrity.org.

Overall, the consensus across these studies is that very few cases of prosecutorial misconduct result in disciplinary sanctions – and most sanctions amount to a proverbial slap on the wrist. Considering that reported cases of misconduct are relatively infrequent due to arcane complaint procedures, lax enforcement, and a culture of secrecy and indifference by regulatory agencies, one must conclude that the problem of prosecutorial misconduct in our nation's criminal justice system is much greater than the official numbers reflect.

“Each year, thousands of Americans are victimized by prosecutors who overcharge, withhold key evidence, and engage in a myriad of other forms of professional misconduct,” the Center for Prosecutor Integrity stated in a 2013 report. “When these persons later seek redress, they encounter denial, resistance, and delays. More often than not, their efforts to receive even an apology end in futile exasperation.”

Types of Misconduct

THE PROSECUTOR'S ROLE IN OUR ADVERSARIAL justice system – to obtain convictions, regardless of a defendant's guilt or innocence – necessarily creates competitiveness in terms of winning cases. But as stated by the U.S. Supreme Court, “[W]hile he may strike hard blows, he is not at liberty to strike foul ones. It is as much his duty to refrain from improper methods calculated to produce a wrongful conviction as it is to use every legitimate means to bring about a just one.” See: Berger v. United States, 295 U.S. 78, 88 (1935).

According to the Innocence Project and the Center for Prosecutor Integrity, the “foul blows” that prosecutors may strike can assume many forms, including:

- Charging a suspect with more offenses than is warranted
- Making race-based jury selection decisions in violation of Batson v. Kentucky
- Withholding or delaying the release of exculpatory evidence
- Deliberately mishandling, destroying or “losing” evidence
- Allowing witnesses they know or should know are not truthful to testify
- Pressuring or threatening defense witnesses not to testify
- Pressuring or threatening witnesses to testify for the prosecution
- Relying on fraudulent forensic experts
- During plea negotiations, overstating the strength of the evidence
- Making statements that are designed to arouse public indignation
- Making improper or misleading statements to the jury or court
- Failing to report misconduct by other prosecutors

Prosecutorial misconduct has many permutations. Beyond the more typical examples cited above, sometimes prosecutors simply break the law themselves, using their position of authority to further their own personal interests.

In one such case, on February 11, 2014, former Cameron County, Texas district attorney Armando R. Villalobos, once seen as a rising political star, was sentenced to 13 years in federal prison following his conviction for taking more than $100,000 in bribes. According to the U.S. Attorney's office, his misconduct was part of a pattern of "extortion, favoritism, improper influence, personal self-enrichment, self-dealing, concealment, and conflict of interest."

Among other abuses, Villalobos was accused of allowing Amit Livingston, a convicted murderer, to remain free without bond before reporting to prison to serve a 23-year sentence. Why? So the $500,000 in Livingston's bond money could be released to settle a civil lawsuit filed by the family of his victim, with Villalobos receiving a $80,000 kickback from attorney fees paid in the suit.

Livingston didn't report to prison and fled to India, where he was eventually caught.

A Focus on Brady Violations

BY FAR, THE MOST COMMONLY-CITED TYPE of prosecutorial misconduct in wrongful conviction cases involves the withholding of exculpatory evidence. While many forms of misconduct can result in a conviction being overturned, so-called "Brady violations," named after Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963), are most often reported, as the withheld evidence can lead to the reversal of a conviction or finding of innocence.

For example, Michael Morton spent almost 25 years in Texas prisons for murdering his wife, only to discover that Williamson County district attorney Ken Anderson had withheld evidence at his trial – including a transcript of a telephone conversation in which his young son said a "monster," not his father, had beaten his mother to death and that his father was "not home" at the time. Neighbors had seen a man in a green van parked in front of Morton's house several times before his wife's murder.

Based on the belated disclosure of this evidence, a DNA test on a bloody bandana found near the crime scene was matched to another suspect, Mark Alan Norwood, and Morton was released from prison in October 2011. He was exonerated two months later. Williamson County district attorney John Bradley had objected to the DNA testing. [See: PLN, Feb. 2012, p.50].

In Brady, the U.S. Supreme Court held that the "suppression by the prosecution of evidence favorable to an accused upon request violates due process where the evidence is material either to guilt or to punishment, irrespective of the good faith or bad faith of the prosecution."

There are three components of a Brady violation: The withheld evidence must be favorable to the defendant because it is exculpatory or can be used for impeachment purposes; the evidence must have been suppressed by the prosecution, either willfully or unintentionally; and prejudice to the defendant must have resulted.

Even when a defendant fails to properly request favorable evidence, the government is still liable for failure to disclose certain information. Constitutional error results if favorable evidence is withheld and "there is a reasonable probability that, had the evidence been disclosed to the defense, the result of the proceeding would have been different."

While nondisclosure of Brady material constitutes a violation of sundry constitutional protections and professional standards, such violations are, in the words of the Sixth Circuit, "still a perennial problem, as multiple scholarly accounts attest."

In a case involving Abel Tavera, a defendant charged with drug offenses, federal prosecutor Donald W. Taylor was informed by a co-defendant that Tavera had no knowledge of the drug conspiracy. However, Taylor did not share that information with defense counsel. The appellate court reversed Tavera's conviction and recommended "that the U.S. Attorney's office for the Eastern District of Tennessee conduct an investigation of why this prosecutorial error occurred and make sure that such Brady violations do not continue." See: United States v. Tavera, 719 F.3d 705, 708 (6th Cir. 2013).

Brady violations persist, in part, because few prosecutors face any consequences for failing to disclose evidence. The Morton case is an exception, as the former prosecutor in that case, Ken Anderson, who later became a Williamson County district judge, was arrested in 2013 and charged with criminal contempt, fabricating evidence and other offenses related to his misconduct in Morton's prosecution and wrongful conviction.

In a September 2013 letter to Texas Governor Rick Perry announcing his resignation from the bench, Anderson made no mention of the Morton case, blandly stating that "[t]here comes a time when every public official must decide that it is time to leave public office."

Anderson, who also surrendered his law license, pleaded no contest and was sentenced to 10 days in jail and a $500 fine on November 8, 2013. He served a total of 5 days, which pales in comparison to the 8,989 days that Morton spent in prison. In an editorial, The New York Times called Anderson's sentence "insultingly short."

Morton received almost $2 million in compensation plus a lifetime annuity from the State of Texas for his wrongful conviction; following a Court of Inquiry ordered by the Texas Supreme Court, Williamson County paid approximately $500,000 in legal costs and fees. The Michael Morton case is described in detail in a book titled Getting Life: An Innocent Man's 25-Year Journey from Prison to Peace, published in July 2014.

Most prosecutors, however, manage to evade responsibility for Brady violations, even in cases that are highly publicized – such as the botched prosecution of the late Ted Stevens, a former U.S. Senator.

In 2008, Stevens was found guilty of receiving illegal financial benefits and failing to report them. His conviction was set aside before sentencing and the indictment dismissed after the Department of Justice (DOJ) admitted federal prosecutors had withheld exculpatory evidence related to statements made by the chief witness at Stevens' trial.

U.S. District Court Judge Emmet G. Sullivan granted the government's motion to dismiss in April 2009, and appointed a special prosecutor "to investigate and prosecute such criminal contempt proceedings as may be appropriate" against the AUSAs involved in the Stevens prosecution.

"In nearly 25 years on the bench, I've never seen anything approaching the mishandling and misconduct that I've seen in this case," Judge Sullivan stated.

Although the special prosecutor found "the evidence establishes that this misconduct was intentional," it was also legally insufficient to support a conviction under the federal criminal contempt statute, 18 U.S.C. § 401. The reason? None of the discovery orders issued by Judge Sullivan "specifically directed the prosecutors" to disclose the Brady evidence at issue. Absent a clear order from the court, it could not be proven that the prosecutors' actions rose to the level of contempt, notwithstanding that disclosure of exculpatory evidence is a basic tenet of our criminal justice system.

Sadly, Stevens, who had steadfastly maintained his innocence, lost his bid for reelection shortly after he was convicted and died in a plane crash in 2010, the year after the charges were dismissed. The federal prosecutors accused of withholding evidence, Joseph W. Bottini and James A. Goeke, were suspended without pay for 40 days and 15 days, respectively. [See: PLN, March 2013, p.38]. Ironically, their suspensions were overturned in April 2013 after an administrative judge found the Justice Department had violated its own procedures. A third prosecutor involved in the Stevens case, Nicholas Marsh, committed suicide.

Prosecutorial misconduct occurs for a variety of reasons, but with respect to Brady violations, an inadequate oversight system to detect, review and sanction such abuses may encourage some prosecutors to take their chances by withholding evidence. Further, although Brady and its progeny decisions have routinely bemoaned the unfairness that results when prosecutors deprive a defendant of favorable evidence, post-trial appellate reviews of such violations focus on the effect the evidence might have had on the verdict, requiring the defendant to demonstrate a "reasonable probability" of a different outcome had the evidence been disclosed – a fairly subjective standard.

As stated by the U.S. Supreme Court, the "materiality inquiry is not just a matter of determining whether, after discounting the inculpatory evidence in light of the undisclosed evidence, the remaining evidence is sufficient to support the jury's conclusions. Rather, the question is whether 'the favorable evidence could reasonably be taken to put the whole case in such a different light as to undermine confidence in the verdict.'" See: Strickler v. Greene, 527 U.S. 263, 282 (1999) (prosecution's failure to produce notes of conflicting statements made by eyewitness deemed insufficient to constitute Brady violation in death penalty case) (citations omitted).

With our results-oriented judiciary, the higher the stakes the smaller the likelihood of reversal for Brady violations.

As such, from an adversarial point of view, the temptation for prosecutors to withhold evidence can be an obvious one, as the worst-case scenario is usually a retrial and not dismissal of the charges, and sanctions are unlikely. Simply put, the manner of review of Brady violations carries little disincentive for a prosecutor who puts winning a conviction above their ethical obligation to seek justice.

"There is an epidemic of Brady violations abroad in the land," Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals Chief Judge Alex Kozinski wrote in a dissenting opinion in December 2013. "Only judges can put a stop to it," he added. See: United States v. Olsen, 737 F.3d 625, 626 (9th Cir. 2013).

On August 21, 2013, a federal district court in Pennsylvania granted a death row prisoner's petition for writ of habeas corpus and vacated his conviction and death sentence due to Brady violations by the prosecution that included withholding exculpatory evidence. See: Dennis v. Wetzel, 966 F.Supp.2d 489 (E.D. Pa. 2013) [PLN, July 2014, p.34].

Connick v. Thompson: An Impossible Standard

THE STAKES ARE HIGHEST IN A CAPITAL murder case, and the now-infamous prosecution of John Thompson demonstrates just how far prosecutors are willing to go to stack the deck to obtain a conviction. The Thompson case is a prime example not only of how the justice system permits abuses by prosecutors, but also of how little recourse is accorded to victims of such misconduct. Indeed, even people like Thompson, who came within days of being executed for a crime he did not commit, appear to have no means of obtaining justice when prosecutors abuse their considerable power.

The Criminal Case

In December 1984, someone shot and killed Raymond T. Liuzza, Jr., the son of a prominent New Orleans business executive. One person who witnessed the incident described the shooter as a six-foot-tall black man with "close cut" hair.

Three weeks later, in another part of New Orleans, a man attempted to rob three siblings at gunpoint. During a scuffle, the perpetrator left his blood on the pants leg of one of the victims; a test on a swatch from the pants revealed that the robber's blood was Type B.

John Thompson and Kevin Freeman were arrested and charged with the Liuzza murder. Their arrest came after Richard Perkins, who knew Thompson, approached the Liuzza family seeking a $15,000 reward they had publicized for information about the crime. Freeman fit the eyewitness' six-foot, close-cut hair description; his nickname was "Kojak" because he kept his head nearly shaved. Freeman would later become a key prosecution witness at Thompson's first trial for the murder of Liuzza.

After Thompson's arrest, his photo (with a large afro) was displayed in the newspaper. One of the armed robbery victims saw the picture and said Thompson was the one who had robbed them; they later picked the same photo out of a photographic lineup. Thompson was then indicted for the robbery. During the investigation of the armed robbery, a crime scene technician wrote that the prosecution "[m]ay wish to do a blood test."

District Attorney Harry F. Connick had appointed his third-in-command, Eric Dubelier, to prosecute the high-profile Liuzza case, and later named him special prosecutor in the armed robbery case. Assistant district attorneys Jim Williams and Gerry Deegan were also appointed to the prosecutorial team.

In a "strategic move," the prosecutors successfully petitioned the Orleans Parish Criminal Court to switch the order of the trials so Thompson would be tried for the armed robbery first (even though the robbery had occurred after Liuzza's murder). Two days before the trial, the bloody swatch from the robbery was identified as being blood Type B; Thompson's attorneys were not advised of the test results. On the first day of trial, Deegan checked out the bloody swatch from the evidence file and it was never returned.

The strategic value of reversing the order of the trials was two-fold. A robbery conviction would likely keep Thompson from testifying on his own behalf at the later murder trial, because the conviction would be disclosed to the jury if he testified. Further, the robbery conviction could be used to increase the likelihood of a death sentence in the murder case.

The blood test evidence was not mentioned at the armed robbery trial. Based "solely on the descriptions" of the robber by the three victims, Thompson was convicted and sentenced to 49.5 years in prison without parole – the maximum sentence.

During pretrial proceedings in the armed robbery case, Thompson's attorney had filed a Brady motion seeking access to all evidence "favorable to the defendant" and "material and relevant to the issue of guilt and punishment," as well as "any results or reports [of] scientific tests or experiments." When Thompson's attorney went to inspect the evidence he was unaware of the bloody swatch, which had been checked out by the prosecution.

A month later, Thompson was tried for the Liuzza murder.

As with the blood evidence at the armed robbery trial, the prosecutors did whatever they could to prevent Thompson from accessing evidence helpful to his defense in the murder case. First, they did not disclose available audiotapes of Perkins' calls to the Liuzza family seeking a reward, which would have rebutted the prosecution's claim that there was no "direct evidence" that reward money had motivated any of the witnesses.

Second, the prosecutors withheld a police report that could have contradicted Freeman's trial testimony, depriving Thompson of key impeachment evidence.

Third, they withheld police reports of the initial eyewitness' description of the shooter as being six-foot with "close cut" hair. This would have provided Thompson with much-needed information suggesting that Freeman, a.k.a. "Kojak," had committed the crime.

Thompson was found guilty of first-degree murder. Since he was already serving a de facto life sentence for the armed robbery charge, the prosecution urged that "the only way to punish him for murder was to execute him." The jury sentenced him to death.

Fourteen years after his murder conviction, Thompson had exhausted all of his appeals. His execution was scheduled for May 20, 1999. In April, in a last-ditch effort to save Thompson's life, an investigator once again reviewed the evidence file and found a microfiche copy of the crime lab report containing the blood type from the evidence in the armed robbery case. Thompson was then tested – his blood was Type O – and after his attorneys presented this evidence to Connick's office, a stay of execution was ordered.

In the ensuing investigation, it was learned that in 1994, prosecutor Deegan had confessed to a former colleague that he had "intentionally suppressed" the blood type evidence. Deegan made the confession only after learning he had cancer, and he later died. The colleague, Michael Riehlmann, himself a former Orleans Parish prosecutor, did not tell anyone about the confession until after Thompson's stay of execution. Three other prosecutors were aware of the blood evidence but did not disclose it to defense counsel.

Thompson's conviction in the armed robbery case was vacated upon the state's motion, and he was not retried.

Connick then convened a grand jury, ostensibly to consider charges related to the concealment of the blood type evidence. He terminated the grand jury after one day, however, leading John Glas, the assistant district attorney prosecuting the concealment case, to resign in protest.

Thompson filed a motion for post-conviction relief on the murder charge and, in 2001, his death sentence was changed to life imprisonment on the grounds that the wrongful armed robbery conviction had been used as evidence in the capital sentencing proceedings. The Louisiana Court of Appeals reversed Thompson's murder conviction in 2002 but did not address the merits of his Brady violation claims. See: State v. Thompson, 825 So.2d 552 (La. Ct. App. 2002).

Not satisfied with this outcome, District Attorney Connick retried Thompson for the Liuzza murder. This time Thompson testified in his own defense and was able to use at least ten new pieces of evidence that had not been available during the first trial. They included the police reports describing the assailant's "close cut" hair, reports about informant Perkins' meeting with the Liuzza family and seeking a reward, audio tapes of those meetings and inconsistent statements made by Freeman, the probable shooter.

Additionally, numerous other witnesses testified who had not been disclosed by the police at the first trial. Even considering transcripts of Freeman's original trial testimony – he had been killed in the interim – the jury deliberated only 35 minutes before returning a verdict of not guilty. Thompson was then released from prison, having served more than 18 years.

The Civil Case

In 2003, Thompson filed a civil rights action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, alleging that Connick, other officials in his office and the District Attorney's office itself had violated his constitutional rights. He alleged state law claims, including malicious prosecution, in addition to § 1983 claims of wrongful suppression of evidence and conspiracy.

Prior to a February 2007 trial, all claims were dismissed except one alleging that Connick and the District Attorney's office were liable for having an unconstitutional Brady policy and being "deliberately indifferent" to Thompson's rights and the need to adequately train and supervise employees making Brady determinations. The jury found for Thompson, awarding him $14 million in damages, and the district court awarded around $1 million in attorney fees. [See: PLN, Oct. 2007, p.22].

The Fifth Circuit affirmed the judgment in December 2008. In doing so, the appellate court rejected Connick's argument that establishing "deliberate indifference" requires evidence of a pattern of misconduct. The Court of Appeals held that deliberate indifference could be established when "the need for more or different training is so obvious, and the inadequacy so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights, that the policymakers of the city can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need."

The Fifth Circuit granted rehearing

en banc and affirmed the judgment in an evenly-divided decision. In four separate opinions, the appellate court disputed whether Thompson could establish municipal liability on a failure-to-train theory based on the “single” Brady violation in his case, without proving a prior pattern of similar violations that is typically required to find municipal liability – although the court acknowledged “that Thompson has suffered a horrible wrong inflicted by agents of the government.” See: Thompson v. Connick, 578 F.3d 293 (5th Cir. 2009).

The U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari and reversed the Fifth Circuit in a 5-4 decision, overturning the $14 million jury award. See: Connick v. Thompson, 131 S.Ct. 1350 (2011) [PLN, Aug. 2011, p.30].

In sum, the Court reversed the judgment on the basis that Thompson failed to prove that Connick had actual or constructive notice of, and was therefore deliberately indifferent to, a need for adequate Brady training. A “pattern of similar constitutional violations” by untrained employees was necessary to demonstrate deliberate indifference for purposes of a failure-to-train claim. It mattered not that Connick and his office had been taken to task on numerous occasions for Brady violations – even by the Supreme Court itself in a previous case, Kyles v. Whitley, 115 S.Ct. 1555 (1995).

Nor did it matter that the District Attorney’s office had failed to offer any formal Brady training to its prosecutors, because, as Justice Clarence Thomas wrote, “all attorneys must graduate from law school or pass a substantive bar examination ... [t]hese threshold requirements are designed to ensure that all new attorneys have learned how to find, understand, and apply legal rules.” Formal training also was not needed because “junior prosecutors were trained by senior prosecutors who supervised them as they worked together to prepare cases for trial, and trial chiefs oversaw the preparation of the cases.”

The majority opinion indicated the Supreme Court had great confidence in the ability of prosecutors to monitor themselves and in the legal profession to punish those who violate ethical standards.

Ultimately, Thompson could not satisfy a failure-to-train theory of liability based upon a single Brady violation. “Thompson needed to show that Connick was on notice that, absent additional specified training, it was ‘highly predictable’ that the prosecutors in his office would be confounded by those gray areas and make incorrect Brady decisions as a result.” The Supreme Court concluded he did not make that showing, and therefore reversed the judgment and jury award.

In doing so, the Court created a virtually impossible standard of proof for those who sue municipalities for prosecutorial misconduct: one must not only prove a violation of constitutional rights, but that the violation was part of a pattern of such misconduct. This effectively gives municipalities a free bite – or several free bites – at the prosecutorial misconduct apple before they can be held liable. And notably, municipalities are often the only defendants that victims of prosecutorial misconduct can sue, since prosecutors have absolute immunity for conduct related to their prosecutorial duties.

Only one prosecutor was disciplined in Thompson’s case – Michael Riehlmann, who was cited for not reporting Deegan’s confession about suppressing the blood type evidence in a “reasonable time.” The Louisiana Attorney Discipline Board recommended a six-month suspension but the state Supreme Court imposed only a public reprimand.

Asked by a Huffington Post reporter whether any prosecutors had ever said they were sorry for his wrongful conviction, Thompson responded, "Sorry? For what? You tell me that. Tell me what the hell would they be sorry for. They tried to kill me. To apologize would mean they're admitting the system is broken.... That everyone around them is broken. It's the same motherfucking system that's protecting them."

Less than a year after the Supreme Court's ruling in Connick v. Thompson, the Court found Brady violations by the Orleans Parish District Attorney's Office in another prosecution. In that case, the Court reversed the murder convictions of a defendant based on claims that prosecutors had withheld material evidence. See: Smith v. Cain, 132 S.Ct. 627 (2012).

ABA Model Rule 3.8

THE AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION'S Model Rules of Professional Conduct are widely recognized as the touchstone of ethical behavior for attorneys. Model Rule 3.8, "Special Responsibilities of a Prosecutor," has been adopted by 49 states, Guam, the U.S. Virgin Islands and the District of Columbia. California is the only state to not adopt a similar rule.

While the ABA's Model Rules apply equally to all attorneys, Rule 3.8 is notable because it's the only rule specific to prosecutors. As such, most commentators view Rule 3.8 as the starting point for prosecutorial ethics.

Rule 3.8 defines "special" ethical duties applicable to prosecutors, including the following, among others. The Rule provides that prosecutors shall:

- Refrain from prosecuting a charge that the prosecutor knows is not supported by probable cause;

- Make timely disclosure to the defense of all evidence or information known to the prosecutor that tends to negate the guilt of the accused or mitigates the offense, and, in connection with sentencing, disclose to the defense and to the tribunal all unprivileged mitigating information known to the prosecutor, except when the prosecutor is relieved of this responsibility by a protective order of the tribunal;

- Except for statements that are necessary to inform the public of the nature and extent of the prosecutor's action and that serve a legitimate law enforcement purpose, refrain from making extrajudicial comments that have a substantial likelihood of heightening public condemnation of the accused;

- When informed of new, credible and material evidence creating a reasonable likelihood that a convicted defendant did not commit an offense of which the defendant was convicted, the prosecutor shall promptly disclose that evidence to an appropriate court or authority and, if the conviction was obtained in the prosecutor's jurisdiction, promptly disclose that evidence to the defendant unless a court authorizes delay, and undertake further investigation, or make reasonable efforts to cause an investigation, to determine whether the defendant was convicted of an offense that the defendant did not commit; and

- When a prosecutor knows of clear and convincing evidence establishing that a defendant in the prosecutor's jurisdiction was convicted of an offense that the defendant did not commit, the prosecutor shall seek to remedy the conviction.

Model Rule 3.8 imposes disclosure obligations that are "separate from and broader than the Brady constitutional standards," as the ABA noted in an amicus brief filed with the Supreme Court in Smith v. Cain.

With this in mind, Rule 3.8 would seem to require prosecutors to adhere to a heightened standard of conduct. Yet this is only in theory because, as a 2011 Yale Law Journal Online article notes, the Rule's "vague terminology undermines its efficacy and enforceability in practice."

For example, "Rule 3.8's prescriptive force is [] greatly diminished by its failure to address many important aspects of the prosecutorial function," including plea bargains. More than 90% of federal criminal prosecutions are resolved through guilty pleas [see: PLN, Jan. 2013, p.20]; however, Rule 3.8 fails to address prosecutorial conduct during plea negotiations.

"In sum, Model Rule 3.8 promises on its face more than it delivers in practice," the Yale Law article concludes. "While there are many instances of prosecutorial misconduct that clearly fall within its ambit, the Rule fails to address some of the more significant aspects of the prosecutor's justice-seeking role."

Even if flawed, Rule 3.8 is still one of the few existing tools for curbing prosecutorial misconduct. Indeed, Innocence Project co-founder Barry Scheck and former federal judge Nancy Gertner co-authored an article recommending that defense attorneys specifically cite Model Rule 3.8

when filing pretrial motions for disclosure of evidence, accompanied by a proposed order mandating such disclosures.

Yet in spite of Rule 3.8, state bar requirements, and Brady and other case law related to prosecutorial misconduct, abuses by prosecutors continue to occur.

The Trayvon Martin Case

MOST PEOPLE ARE FAMILIAR WITH THE Trayvon Martin case, in which Florida neighborhood watch captain George Zimmerman was prosecuted for shooting and killing Martin, 17, as the teenager was walking back to his house. Zimmerman was acquitted of murder and manslaughter charges on July 13, 2013.

Not as many people are aware of allegations of prosecutorial misconduct raised in connection with the Trayvon Martin case.

According to a lawsuit filed by Ben Kruidbos, a former employee of Florida State Attorney Angela Corey, who oversaw Zimmerman's prosecution, he was fired by Corey after testifying on behalf of Zimmerman in regard to Brady material he believed should have been disclosed. Kruidbos, terminated from his job as director of information technology for the State Attorney's office, testified at a pretrial hearing that he was "shocked" that prosecutors had not turned over to Zimmerman's attorneys evidence of photos and text messages he had recovered from Martin's cell phone.

The photos included images of a pile of jewelry on a bed, underage nude females, marijuana and a hand holding a semiautomatic weapon, plus a text message concerning a gun transaction. They appeared to fall under Florida's Brady-based disclosure rules, and Kruidbos said he emailed them to Corey's lead prosecutor in the Martin case. Concerned that the prosecution had not shared the photos and texts with the defense team, Kruidbos directed his attorneys to contact Zimmerman's lawyers concerning the withheld evidence. The defense finally received the evidence shortly before Zimmerman's trial began.

While the photos were ultimately ruled inadmissible by the judge because there was no proof that Martin himself took the pictures, the failure to disclose that evidence prompted Zimmerman's attorneys to move for sanctions against Corey and the prosecution team. Florida Bar rules require that the prosecutor "make timely disclosure of all evidence known to the prosecutor that tends to negate the guilt of the accused or mitigates the offense."

After contacting Zimmerman's attorneys, Kruidbos was initially placed on leave and then fired, with his termination letter accusing him of "deliberate, willful and unscrupulous actions." He then filed a $5 million whistleblower suit against the State Attorney's office.

Corey filed a counterclaim against Kruidbos in February 2014, stating he had been terminated for violating policy by deleting files and sharing information during a pending case. See: Kruidbos v. Corey, Fourth Judicial Circuit Court (FL), Case No. 16-2013-CA-007407.

Kruidbos' lawsuit alleges conduct that appears to constitute a clear violation of the prosecution's Brady obligation to share evidence with the defense. However, Zimmerman's legal team announced in March 2014 that it was dismissing the motion for sanctions against Corey and lead prosecutor Bernie de la Rionda.

Kruidbos' suit remains pending. His attorney, Wesley White, a former employee of the State Attorney's office himself, said Kruidbos' firing sent a message to other employees to not disclose wrongdoing by prosecutors. "If they do speak to an attorney, then they are dead," he remarked. "[The] State Attorney's office will do whatever is necessary to not only terminate them, but

Prosecutorial Misconduct in Miami

AT THE SOUTHERN END OF FLORIDA, prosecutorial misconduct is alive and well in the federal courts, too. Several high-profile criminal cases in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Florida involving Assistant U.S. Attorney Andrea G. Hoffman have come undone due to her misconduct; as a result, several Columbian nationals charged in large-scale, multi-national drug investigations are headed home.

Fifty-six Columbians were arrested in multiple investigations – Operation Seven Trumpets, Operation Under the Sea and Operation BACRIM (Bandas Criminales) – that resulted in the seizure of 20 tons of cocaine and heroin, millions of dollars in cash, 21 airplanes and even 12 submarines. The arrests were hailed at a press conference that included the President of Columbia. Due to Hoffman’s wrongdoing, some of those cases have fallen apart.

First, defendants John Winer and Jose Buitrago no longer faced sentences of life without parole after U.S. District Court Judge Marcia Cooke held that Hoffman had withheld key evidence from the defense, including cash payments made by the DEA to Columbian officers. After Hoffman changed her story about her knowledge of the payments and offered a tepid apology, Judge Cooke said she believed the government knew about the payments but did not disclose that information to defense counsel.

“The prosecutor was ethically and legally bound to turn the information over,” she stated in May 2013. “This does not make sense to me. This is all you do. Answer this: Why does the government get a pass?”

Hoffman had no answer. A deal was then struck for Winer and Buitrago to plead guilty to a lesser conspiracy charge; they were sentenced to 36 months in prison with two years’ pretrial credit, and subsequently released.

Operation Seven Trumpets suffered other setbacks due to Hoffman’s misconduct. Defendant Daniel Bustos had arranged to purchase “inside information” from another defendant in the drug case, Fabian Cruz, that he could use to testify against Winer and Buitrago in exchange for a lighter sentence. Hoffman had been prepared to let Bustos testify until the defense team uncovered the scheme and Judge Cooke ordered Hoffman to produce a letter, which she had not disclosed to the defense, indicating that Bustos was buying information from Cruz.

Further, Hoffman was forced to drop charges against defendant Carlos Ortega-Bonilla on August 31, 2013 after investigators proved he was not a participant in the case, notwithstanding Hoffman’s argument that she had a secret witness implicating him.

Another defendant, William Gil-Perenguez, was also freed after a fellow prisoner, Neixi Garcia Lamela, told him “DEA agents and Hoffman pressured me to implicate you, but I refused because I knew I would be fabricating testimony to implicate an innocent person.” Federal judge Donald Graham later freed Gil-Perenguez after finding that he had been wrongly identified in wiretaps. Gil-Perenguez filed suit, but the Eleventh Circuit upheld the dismissal of his complaint because the claims arose in a foreign country. See: Gil-Perenguez v. United States, 49 Fed.Appx. 781 (11th Cir. 2011), cert. denied.

Charges against two other Columbians, Luis Alfonso Rubiano Ramos and Jose Mejia Cortez, also were dismissed.

In an unrelated earlier case involving an award of $601,795.88 in attorney fees and costs against the federal government, U.S. District Court Judge Alan S. Gold publicly reprimanded Hoffman and another prosecutor, Sean Paul Cronin, for “acting vexatiously and in bad faith” in prosecuting Dr. Ali Shayan, who was acquitted of federal charges of overprescribing medications.

“These events are profoundly disturbing,” wrote Judge Gold. “They raise troubling issues about the integrity of those who wield enormous power over the people they prosecute.... Our system of criminal justice cannot long survive unless prosecutors strictly adhere to their ethical obligations; avoid even the appearance of partiality, and directly obey discovery obligations and court orders.”

The public reprimands and award of fees and costs were later reversed by the Eleventh Circuit, which found the district court had violated Hoffman and Cronin’s due process rights. See: United States v. Shayan, 661 F.Supp.2d 1289 (S.D. Fla. 2009), vacated, 652 F.3d 1297 (11th Cir. 2011), cert denied.

Hoffman remains employed in the appellate division of the U.S. Attorney’s office for the Southern District of Florida.

Appellate Ruling in Lopez-Avila

THE NINTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS had strong words about prosecutorial misconduct in a criminal case involving Aurora Lopez-Avila, a Mexican national and low-level drug offender. The Assistant U.S. Attorney in that case, Jerry R. Albert, was found to have intentionally misrepresented testimony from a plea hearing during Lopez-Avila’s trial. Circuit Judge Donald Walter told a news reporter that he was “surprised to hear” Albert was still a prosecutor, but apparently not surprised enough to do much about it – even though he said Albert’s conduct “was the worst [he’d] ever seen from an Assistant U.S. Attorney.”

The Court of Appeals issued an amended decision after the U.S. Attorney's office asked the Court to remove Albert's name from its original ruling. In the amended opinion, the appellate court noted: "The Department of Justice has an obligation to its lawyers and to the public to prevent prosecutorial misconduct. Prosecutors, as servants of the law, are subject to constraints and responsibilities that do not apply to other lawyers; they must serve truth and justice first. Their job is not just to win, but to win fairly, staying within the rules. That did not happen here.... When a prosecutor steps over the boundaries of proper conduct and into unethical territory, the government has a duty to own up to it and to give assurances that it will not happen again. Yet, we cannot find a single hint of appreciation of the seriousness of the misconduct within the pages of the government's brief on appeal." (citations omitted).

Regardless, "it is not our task to conduct a thorough investigation of Albert's conduct for disciplinary purposes," the Ninth Circuit wrote. "However, we do not need a record greater or different than we have here to determine that Albert should not have misrepresented the transcript's question. Accordingly, we are in a position to do three things to ensure that this matter is handled properly following this disposition: we remand the case to allow the district court to consider dismissal with prejudice of the indictment as an exercise of its supervisory powers and to prevent other misconduct in the future; we instruct the district court to consider disciplinary options also pursuant to its supervisory powers; and we note that the Office of Professional Responsibility within the Department of Justice has the responsibility of investigating allegations of misconduct by federal prosecutors." See: United States v. Lopez-Avila, 678 F.3d 955 (9th Cir. 2012).

Following remand, the district court dismissed all charges against Lopez-Avila. Noting that "dismissal under the court's supervisory powers for prosecutorial misconduct requires (1) flagrant misbehavior and (2) substantial prejudice," the district court found dismissal was appropriate due to Albert's "direct misrepresentation to the court."

Albert subsequently received a reprimand from the state presiding disciplinary judge on June 17, 2013, and was assessed

$1,200 for the costs of the disciplinary proceeding. He is no longer employed by the U.S. Attorney's office.

New Orleans Prosecutors Resign

U.S. DISTRICT COURT JUDGE KURT Englehardt set aside the convictions of five New Orleans police officers involved in the infamous Danziger Bridge killings in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, when officers shot and killed two unarmed citizens and wounded four others. The court took this action after it was revealed that prosecutors from the local U.S. Attorney's office and the Department of Justice's home office had attempted to create adverse pretrial publicity in the case, perhaps to contaminate the jury pool, through anonymous Internet postings. They had also leaked information about the case to the news media.

One of the postings, for example, referred to New Orleans police officers as "a collection of self-centered, self-interested, self-promoting, insular, arrogant, overweening, prevaricating, libidinous fools ... who, when not having sex with each other, [are] beating, burning and abusing the citizens. Thank God for the Feds – can you imagine

New Orleans without a Federal presence?"

When it was discovered that some of the postings could have only come from the prosecution's files, Judge Englehardt took the extraordinary step of vacating the police officers' convictions for civil rights violations on September 17, 2013 and granting a new trial. In a 129-page opinion, he wrote that the prosecutors had violated federal regulations, court rules, bar disciplinary rules and Department of Justice policies, and said the case had been compromised by "grotesque prosecutorial misconduct." Judge Englehardt stated he would be referring the matter for disciplinary proceedings against the prosecutors and their superiors, demonstrating that at least some in the judiciary are concerned about misconduct. The prosecutors accused of the inappropriate online postings were senior litigation counsel Sal Perricone and AUSA Jan Mann. See: United States v. Bowen, 969 F.Supp.2d 546 (E.D. La. 2013).

In December 2012, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten, who was in charge of the New Orleans office, resigned due to the scandal. On July 28, 2014, the chief judge for the U.S. District Court for the Middle District of Louisiana held that Perricone (a former FBI agent) and Mann could no longer practice law in that court. Perricone has appealed the restriction, arguing that because he was on prescription medication at the time, he could not remember his inappropriate Internet comments.

Mann and Perricone left the U.S. Attorney's office in 2012 and agreed not to practice in federal court in the Eastern District, which includes New Orleans; however, they are still able to practice in other federal districts.

A Failed Disciplinary System

PROSECUTORIAL MISCONDUCT HAS BECOME commonplace in our criminal justice system primarily because the disciplinary process purporting to address such violations is ineffectual and deeply flawed.

In Connick, one of the Supreme Court's justifications for prohibiting most lawsuits against municipalities for prosecutorial misconduct was that the disciplining of rogue prosecutors is already being addressed. "An attorney who violates his or her ethical obligations is subject to professional discipline, including sanctions, suspension, and disbarment," the Court stated.

Yet while it's true that prosecutors are subject to professional discipline, the cases in which they are actually brought before disciplinary tribunals and sanctioned are exceedingly rare. In fact, some commentators assert that such discipline isn't really occurring at all. As noted above, of the thousands of documented cases where prosecutorial misconduct was found by the courts, only a fraction have resulted in disciplinary proceedings.

Why does the disciplinary system fail to address prosecutorial misconduct in a meaningful way? The reasons are several. First, most bar associations and other agencies charged with attorney discipline do not usually initiate investigations themselves. Rather, aggrieved members of the public or others involved in the justice system file a formal complaint that may or may not result in an investigation.

Public Complaint Process

With respect to the public, complaints often come from those who claim to have been wronged by the prosecutor. The process for initiating complaints can be inconvenient and complex. For example, twelve states do not offer a complaint form that can be downloaded, printed and mailed. Only four states – Arizona, Minnesota, Nevada and Virginia – allow the submission of complaints online. Kentucky and New Hampshire require that a complainant file a notarized statement.

Several states go to great lengths to discourage complaints against attorneys, such as Georgia, which requires that a complainant first go through a mediation process. In other jurisdictions the complaint form itself can be complicated; adding to the confusion, the forms often are not designed for complaints against prosecutors, but rather intended for disputes between private attorneys and their clients.

Many states have statutes of limitations for complaints, some computed from the time that an incident occurred – even though prosecutorial misconduct, such as concealing evidence, may not be discovered for years or even decades. As one example, New Hampshire allows for only a two-year period computed from the date of the misconduct, making many, if not most, incidents of prosecutorial misconduct unchallengeable through the complaint process.

While other states compute statutes of limitations from the time when the misconduct was discovered, some statutes can be confusing and conditional upon various timing events, as in North Carolina, where the statute of limitations for attorney misconduct is three years unless the violation involved "felonious criminal conduct."

Further, many states conduct disciplinary proceedings in secret, impose strict confidentiality on complainants and require preliminary investigations that dictate whether a complaint will proceed at all. Even when a violation is found, an investigation may be terminated as a matter of resource allocation. Florida advises the public that the investigation of a complaint "frequently has deterrent value in and of itself," allowing for dismissal of complaints on that basis alone. This is equivalent to saying that criminal charges serve as a deterrent even if the charges are dropped and the accused set free.

Notably, many states consider the complainant to be a witness to the disciplinary process and not a party, leaving no recourse to appeal an adverse finding or dismissal of a complaint. Twenty-three states do not afford a complainant the right to appeal the initial dismissal of a bar investigation. And if a complaint makes it through the preliminary proceedings, formal action before a disciplinary tribunal is conducted by the bar, leaving the complainant out of the process entirely.

Further, the protracted length of formal proceedings can take its toll. In Louisiana, where John Thompson was victimized by prosecutorial misconduct, the average time between the filing of a complaint and the issuance of a decision is over three years.

Government Oversight

As for government watchdog agencies, notwithstanding statutory and regulatory duties to investigate prosecutorial misconduct, the culture tends to be restrictive – and secretive.

For example, the Office of Professional Responsibility (OPR), the U.S. Department of Justice's internal agency for attorney discipline, routinely refuses to release the names of prosecutors who have committed wrongdoing.

The OPR has repeatedly ignored calls for more transparency, arguing that the Privacy Act of 1974 precludes the release of such information. "OPR is a black hole. Stuff goes in, nothing comes out," said Jim E. Levine, former president of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers. "The public, the defense attorneys and the judiciary have lost respect for the government's ability to police itself." [See: PLN, Aug. 2011, p.12].

report, the agency received 819 complaints that year and opened 126 investigations or inquiries. It also resolved 122 cases in 2013, which included complaints from previous years. Of the 122 investigations and inquiries closed in 2013, the vast majority were dismissed upon a finding of no merit to the allegations. Only 18 cases resulted in a finding of professional misconduct – up from 14 in 2012.

In March 2014, the Project on Government Oversight reported that over a 12-year period, from fiscal year 2002 through 2013, the OPR had documented 650 infractions committed by federal attorneys and other Department of Justice employees. More than 400 of those violations were considered serious, involving reckless disregard to or intentional violation of a law, rule or ethical standard. The OPR does not consider lesser infractions, such as exercising poor judgment and making mistakes, to constitute misconduct.

Reporting by Defense Attorneys

Relying on defense counsel to report prosecutorial misconduct has not resulted in consistent results, either. The disincentives are many. First, most misconduct proceedings related to criminal cases cannot begin until after the case has been resolved. At that time, a defense attorney's representation of his or her client is usually over, leaving the lawyer without compensation for the time and effort required to pursue a disciplinary complaint.

Second, many defense attorneys are hesitant to file complaints against prosecutors they must deal with on a day-to-day basis, and who will be opposing them in future cases. This is especially true in rural areas, where making enemies in the only courthouse in town is not an attractive proposition.

Lastly, with more than 90% of all criminal cases being resolved through plea bargains, when misconduct occurs it may be used as a bargaining chip during plea negotiations, precluding a formal complaint. In short, reliance on the defense bar to report prosecutorial misconduct is an inadequate means of oversight.

Judicial Disciplinary Referrals

Many judges, notwithstanding well-defined duties to report known incidents of misconduct, seem hesitant to report prosecutors for disciplinary proceedings – as indicated by the relative dearth of disciplinary complaints filed by the judiciary. The fact that many judges are former prosecutors themselves may also be a contributing factor.

Moreover, despite Judge Henry Floyd's complaint that "something must be done" about recurring wrongdoing by prosecutors, many judges seem content with allowing others to handle the dirty work of disciplinary complaints, vacating convictions when necessary due to the taint of misconduct but infrequently referring cases for disciplinary action.

In its ruling in the Lopez-Avila case, while noting that various disciplinary options were available, the Ninth Circuit stated: "[I]t is not our task to conduct a thorough investigation of [AUSA] Albert's conduct for disciplinary purposes," and "We recognize that this court is not the proper venue for direct discipline of Albert, so we will not state here that the blow struck by him necessarily was one so foul as to require some form of official sanction."

Further, judges may choose to focus on other issues in post-conviction appeals rather than allegations of prosecutorial misconduct. For example, in September 2014, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals reversed the murder conviction of Hannah Ruth Overton. Overton had been sentenced to life without parole for the death of her 4-year-old foster child, which was caused by hypernatremia (a salt overdose); on appeal she raised claims of ineffective assistance of counsel and prosecutorial misconduct, the latter related to a Brady violation.

In reversing Overton's conviction, the appellate court based its decision on the ineffective assistance of counsel claim and, therefore, wrote "there is no need for us to address the second issue of whether the State failed to disclose exculpatory evidence." In fact, the majority did not mention any details related to the Brady claims, though they were described in a concurring opinion.

Judge Cathy Cochran, concurring, wrote that Overton's Brady claims included "the alleged withholding of records showing the low sodium content of [the child's] vomit when he was brought to the Urgent Care Center.... [and] the purported failure to disclose ... medical records and knowledge that [the child] suffered from undiagnosed cognitive deficiencies that caused him to have temper tantrums, throw feces, and eat inappropriate items, such as salt."

Judge Cochran also noted: "At the habeas hearing, the lead prosecutor conceded that, during this 2007 trial, she was an alcoholic who was also taking prescription diet pills that affected her memory. She was later fired by the District Attorney ... for unrelated ethical violations. During the habeas hearing, the prosecutor repeated seventy-two times that she did not recall or did not know the answers to questions concerning the investigation or trial of applicant."

The prosecutor accused of misconduct in the case was not identified in the court's ruling. She was former assistant district attorney Sandra Eastwood. See: Ex parte Overton, 2014 Tex.Crim.App. LEXIS 971 (Tex.Crim.App. Sept. 17, 2014).

Prosecutorial Self-Policing

Relying on prosecutors to police themselves has not been successful. A 2013 white paper by the Center for Prosecutor Integrity, titled "An Epidemic of Prosecutor Misconduct," noted that prosecutor associations, such as the National District Attorneys Association (NDAA), have failed to adequately address the issue of misconduct. The paper stated that "A search of the NDAA website using the search terms 'prosecutorial misconduct' or 'prosecutorial error' fails to identify a single office, program, or even publication that is devoted to rectifying this problem."

The same can be said of the National Association of Attorneys General (NAAG), which in 2012 adopted a resolution urging courts, when reviewing the conduct of prosecutors, to differentiate between "errors" and "prosecutorial misconduct," calling the latter a "term of art in criminal law."

Former federal prosecutor Mary Judge Darrow, fired from the North Carolina Eastern District office in 2004, later won $170,000 in a discrimination suit against her former employer. She said she had been criticized by her supervisor for giving too much discovery material to defense attorneys. "For some reason, that was wrong," she stated.

A few district attorneys' offices have established Conviction Integrity Units (CIUs), also known as Conviction Review Units, to examine potential wrongful convictions, new evidence and allegations of misconduct. The first CIU was created in 2007 in Dallas County, Texas following a number of exonerations. Other units have been established in Houston, Texas; Santa Clara, California; Cook County, Illinois; Baltimore, Maryland; Wayne, Michigan; Cuyahoga County, Ohio; Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; and Brooklyn and Manhattan in New York.

The Manhattan CIU reportedly investigated 140 cases from 2010 to April 2014, re-examined at least a dozen of those cases and agreed to vacate three convictions.

Some Conviction Integrity Units only review wrongful convictions after the fact, rather than trying to prevent them in the first place; others do not review cases where the defendant pleaded guilty, even though prosecutorial misconduct may have induced a guilty plea; and some lack public transparency. Plus, of course, such units are typically staffed and overseen by prosecutors, who review convictions obtained by their colleagues.

Legislative Reforms

THERE HAVE BEEN VARIOUS LEGISLATIVE efforts to address prosecutorial misconduct. In May 2013, on the 50th anniversary of the Brady decision, Texas lawmakers passed Senate Bill 1611, also known as the “Michael Morton Act.”

The bill not only expands the discovery obligations of prosecutors in criminal cases, it takes the additional step of adopting the ethical rule standard of requiring Texas prosecutors to timely disclose all information that “tends to negate guilt or mitigate punishment.” The bill had the support of both the Texas District and County Attorneys Association and the Texas Criminal Defense Lawyers Association, and was signed into law by Governor Rick Perry on May 16, 2013.

It is hoped that codifying these requirements, instead of allowing prosecutors to simply “interpret” their Brady obligations and other legal precedents, will ensure the disclosure of exculpatory and mitigating evidence to defendants. The law provides a framework for defense attorneys to move for contempt citations, bar discipline and other sanctions.

Texas also passed another bill as a result of Morton’s wrongful conviction, the Prosecutor Accountability Act (Senate Bill 825), enacted in June 2013, which provides for at least some discipline when a prosecutor violates his or her ethical requirements. While relatively mild in its scope – in some cases, public censure is the only sanction – the bill is seen as a step in the right direction, which is more than most other states have done.

At the federal level, there have been attempts to make the Brady disclosure rule a statutory requirement and otherwise address prosecutorial misconduct. In March 2012, U.S. Senator Lisa Murkowski and a bipartisan group of co-sponsors introduced S.2197, the Fairness in Disclosure of Evidence Act.

The bill sought to clarify implementation of the Brady rule, and was the culmination of a lengthy fight by the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers (NACDL) to codify Brady’s requirements and correct two important misunderstandings of the Brady rule. First, that “favorable” evidence and not merely “exculpatory” evidence is required to be disclosed under Brady. At least in the federal courts, prosecutors would have to turn over anything “favorable” to the defense whether or not it is “exculpatory.” Such statutory language would, according to NACDL, require agencies like the Department of Justice to change its focus to evidence that, in the words of the proposed bill, “may reasonably appear to be favorable to the defendant.”

Second, the Act would help to abandon the “materiality” requirement for Brady evidence applied by many prosecutors. As indicated in Connick and other decisions, some prosecutors take it upon themselves to weigh the relative evidentiary value (materiality) of disclosable information when deciding whether or not to provide it to the defense.

Third, the Fairness in Disclosure of Evidence Act would cover all “information” favorable to the accused without regard to the prospective admissibility of that information. Brady itself involved only a sentencing proceeding where the rules of evidence generally do not apply.

Fourth, the Act would require disclosure of favorable material “without delay after arraignment and before the entry of any guilty plea.” Later-discovered material must be disclosed as soon as “is reasonably practicable.” No triggering demand by defense counsel is required. The Act would supersede any timing provisions for other disclosures, such as the Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3500, which allows prosecutors to withhold Brady material contained in the statements of a witness until the witness has completed his or her direct examination.

Further, the Act would allow for the recovery of costs and other appropriate remedies from the prosecution upon a finding of non-compliance with discovery obligations, irrespective of the outcome of the case.

While the Fairness in Disclosure of Evidence Act died in committee at the end of the 112th Congress, it may be reintroduced in future sessions.

In March 2014 Senator Murkowski introduced the Inspector General Empowerment Act (S.2127), which would move investigations involving misconduct by DOJ attorneys and law enforcement personnel from the Office of Professional Responsibility to the Office of the Inspector General. Attorney General Holder has expressed opposition to the bill, preferring to keep prosecutorial misconduct investigations at the OPR.

Remedial Recommendations

THERE ARE NO EASY FIXES THAT WILL change the tacit, and sometimes not-so-tacit, tolerance of prosecutorial misconduct in our nation's criminal justice system. However, recent efforts to identify and prevent such violations have at least paved the way for additional reforms.

Statutory Solutions

Legislative efforts like those in Texas, and proposed in Congress, are perhaps the most significant steps that can be taken to address issues related to Brady violations and other prosecutorial misconduct. As a 50-year series of Supreme Court decisions has done little to change the culture of resistance to constitutional evidence disclosure standards, compliance needs to be mandated by statute.

Undoubtedly, such efforts will be met with opposition by district attorney associations and law enforcement groups, but the reality is that decades of allowing prosecutors to make evidence disclosure decisions based on their own standards and internal policies, and to self-police those disclosures, has been a failure.

Adopting uniform disclosure obligations via statutory provisions will ensure that all parties involved in criminal proceedings have concrete expectations with respect to disclosure of evidence, which will allow for a more streamlined review process when violations occur.

Likewise, mandatory reporting of prosecutorial misconduct should be required by statute and not solely addressed through professional standards, which lack the force of law and statutorily-imposed penalties.

In May 2014, New York lawmakers introduced a bill that would create an independent state watchdog commission on prosecutorial conduct, to review allegations of misconduct and impose discipline when ethical violations are found.

"I think it would be helpful to both prosecutors and the public to have more confidence in the system," said Senator John DeFrancisco, the bill's sponsor. The legislation, S6286A-2013, remains pending in committee. Other states would do well to consider a similar approach.

Open File Discovery Rules

Perhaps the fastest way to address the problem of prosecutorial non-compliance with evidence disclosure obligations is the widespread adoption of an "open file" discovery process. In some jurisdictions, district attorneys' offices simply open their files so defense counsel can examine all of the evidence and information in a case. While the potential for abuse still exists in open file discovery – there are numerous cases in which unscrupulous prosecutors have withheld evidence – most observers agree that open file discovery is more effective than leaving it to individual prosecutors to make subjective Brady assessments.

Education on Ethical Obligations

In its Connick decision, the Supreme Court's rationale for requiring a pattern of misconduct to prove a failure-to-train claim as a means of imposing municipal liability included a reference to the law school education, bar examinations and professional training that all attorneys are presumed to have received. Sadly, the Court's reliance on such education and training appears misplaced.

Indeed, some law schools do not even require criminal procedure as mandatory coursework. The Tulane University Law School in New Orleans, where the Connick case originated, requires students to take Criminal Law. However, the Constitutional Criminal Procedure course at the school is an elective.

In no area of the law does an individual attorney have more effect on other peoples' lives than in the role of prosecutor, and it is therefore essential to ensure that prosecutors receive sufficient training on their professional and ethical obligations. For those who claim that prosecutors already receive education and training in those areas, it is apparent from the examples of misconduct cited in this article that the current syllabus is inadequate.

Methods to implement such a requirement include via bar certifications to practice as a prosecutor, or through statutory provisions or local court rules.

Greater Transparency

The practice of keeping attorney disciplinary proceedings secret is perhaps the greatest barrier to improving the accuracy and fairness of – and public confidence in – our nation's criminal justice system. In no other area of public service is there such a lack of transparency. This institutional secrecy extends to the judiciary, as many court rulings that address prosecutorial misconduct purposefully do not mention the name of the prosecutor involved.

United States v. Olsen, for example, in which Chief Judge Alex Kozinski voiced a strongly-worded dissent, involved allegations that a federal prosecutor had failed to disclose that a forensic analyst who handled evidence in the case was under investigation for misconduct which had already resulted in three wrongful convictions. Yet the Ninth Circuit's ruling never identified the prosecutor – Assistant U.S. Attorney Earl Hicks.

It is perhaps ironic that those who run for public office are often required to disclose detailed information about their personal life, finances and potential conflicts of interest, yet when it comes to prosecutors who engage in misconduct, such violations of the public trust are deemed too "sensitive" to reveal to the public. Requirements to disclose prosecutorial wrongdoing can only improve the public's trust and faith in the justice system.

After all, the transgressions of criminal defendants are public record; why should violations by those who prosecute them be any less transparent? Disciplinary proceedings need to be open to the public, which in itself would provide a deterrent effect to prosecutorial misconduct. Many state bar disciplinary boards also impose private sanctions that are not publicly reported, such as private reprimands or admonishments, which are insignificant punishments.

Additionally, in order to promote transparency, agencies that handle complaints involving prosecutors should be independent and not under the authority of the district attorney's office or U.S. Attorney's office on the state and federal levels, respectively.

As stated in the 2011 Yale Law Journal Online article on prosecutorial misconduct: "The lack of any external oversight of prosecutors' offices creates an environment in which misconduct can go undetected and undeterred."

Motions for Ethical Disclosures

As mentioned above, there appears to be little downside in promoting a campaign for defense attorneys to file pretrial motions asking courts to require prosecutors to confirm their compliance with ethical and regulatory obligations.

One critic of the current system that fails to adequately address prosecutorial misconduct has suggested the use of “Brady colloquys” by the judiciary. Jason Kreag, a visiting assistant professor at the University of Arizona’s James E. Rogers College of Law, proposes that judges engage in a standard practice of questioning prosecutors about their compliance with evidence disclosure requirements, on the record in open court, during pre-trial hearings and before plea hearings. As Kreag notes, “judges could implement a Brady colloquy today without the need for additional legislation or ethical rules.”

Judge Kozinski stated in his dissenting opinion in United States v. Olsen that “[s]ome prosecutors don’t care about Brady because courts don’t make them care.” A judicially-imposed Brady colloquy in open court would help make prosecutors care, as it would require them to affirm that they have complied with their ethical obligations, thereby creating a record that can be used to easily impose discipline if misconduct is later revealed.

Case Reviews after Misconduct Findings

After a prosecutor is found to have engaged in misconduct by a disciplinary board or other investigative agency, due diligence demands a review of other cases in which the prosecutor was involved.

While rare, that is what occurred in the Michael Morton case, when Williamson County district attorney Jana Duty agreed in November 2013 to allow an independent review of every case handled by former prosecutor Ken Anderson, whose wrongdoing sent Morton to prison for over two decades. The review will be conducted in conjunction with the Innocence Project, and include other cases in which the Williamson County DA’s office successfully objected to DNA tests requested by defendants claiming they were wrongfully convicted.

Curtailling Absolute Immunity

In most cases, prosecutors have absolute immunity for actions taken within the scope of their prosecutorial duties; they cannot be held civilly liable. In theory, this is to protect prosecutors from vexatious and frivolous litigation that would distract them from their responsibilities and make them less inclined to vigorously prosecute criminal cases.

The judicially-created doctrine of prosecutorial absolute immunity was established in Imbler v. Pachtman, 434 U.S. 490 (1977), a death penalty case in which a prosecutor was accused of suppressing evidence and knowingly using false testimony.

The Supreme Court has called absolute immunity “a balance of evils,” and stated it is “better to leave unredressed the wrongs done by dishonest officers than to subject those who try to do their duty to the constant dread of retaliation.” See: Van de Kamp v. Goldstein, 555 U.S. 335 (2009).

Prosecutors wield an enormous amount of power. They decide who to charge and what charges to bring, including whether to seek sentence enhancements, as well as what plea bargains are offered and any conditions that attach to plea deals. But with power comes responsibility, and prosecutors should not enjoy absolutely immunity unless they are absolutely unable to engage in wrongdoing.

Indeed, the doctrine of absolute immunity may actually contribute to misconduct, as prosecutors do not fear the prospect of civil liability and damage awards should their violations be discovered. Abolishing or limiting absolute immunity would force prosecutors to consider the consequences of their actions relative to their personal accountability.

It is obvious from both the examples cited in this article and numerous court decisions that prosecutors are not immune to ethical violations, deliberate wrongdoing and even criminal behavior. Thus, they should not be afforded the benefit of absolute immunity.

It is worth noting that absolute immunity does not extend to prosecutors when they engage in conduct unrelated to their official prosecutorial duties – such as investigative or discretionary activities. For example, one such case involved comments made by a prosecutor during a press conference. See: Buckley v. Fitzsimmons, 113 S.Ct. 2606 (1993).

The distinction as to what conduct is entitled to immunity can be complicated due to various loopholes, however, as discussed in a recent Seventh Circuit decision that found a prosecutor was not entitled to absolute immunity for fabricating evidence before a defendant's indictment and then prosecuting the defendant, who was eventually exonerated after serving 17 years in prison.

In a fairly technical ruling, the Court of Appeals explained that "A prosecutor cannot retroactively immunize himself from conduct by perfecting his [investigatory] wrongdoing through introducing the fabricated evidence at trial and arguing that the tort was not completed until a time at which he had acquired absolute immunity." See: Fields v. Wharrie, 740 F.3d 1107 (7th Cir. 2014).

In a 2014 report, the Center for Prosecutor Integrity suggested replacing prosecutorial absolute immunity with qualified immunity – a lesser form of immunity defense commonly applied to other government actors.

Another alternative to curtailing the absolute immunity granted to prosecutors in civil cases is to file criminal charges against prosecutors who engage in egregious misconduct – particularly misconduct that results in wrongful convictions. That was the suggestion of Dallas County district attorney Craig Watkins, who has proposed the increased use of criminal charges to sanction abusive prosecutors; for example, criminal contempt of court.

But then who would prosecute those prosecutors? Presumably, other prosecutors.

Conclusion

THE Pervasiveness of prosecutorial misconduct is a problem that requires immediate attention by lawmakers, the judiciary, and the professional watchdog organizations and tribunals charged with overseeing attorney discipline, as well as by prosecutors themselves.

Legislative efforts such as the Fairness in Disclosure of Evidence Act are a positive development, though they tend to focus on Brady-related issues and do not reach other forms of wrongdoing. Ultimately, the reporting and redress of prosecutorial misconduct must come from those within the criminal justice system, including judges and defense attorneys, such as through the enforcement of a stronger version of ABA Model Rule 3.8 and similar regulations.

Meaningful disciplinary proceedings, also a useful tool, have been under-utilized, and a change in the "conviction at any cost" culture among prosecutors must be realized through better professional training and education. Only then will we be able to truly address this pervasive problem that serves to undermine public confidence in our criminal justice system – where the emphasis should be on "justice," not conviction rates.

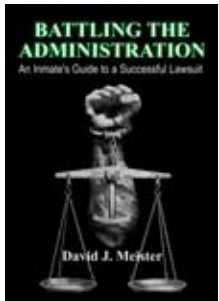

Yet from the viewpoint of those victimized by abusive prosecutors, including those who have been wrongly convicted and imprisoned, disciplinary sanctions such as reprimands, censures and suspensions provide little comfort. Michael Morton spent nearly 25 years in prison; John Thompson was almost executed. And there are many other examples of prosecutorial misconduct that has put innocent people behind bars or on death row.

Ultimately, a change in the adversarial nature of our criminal justice system is needed. Such change is possible, but only if an honest effort is made by everyone involved, beginning with how prosecutors view their own role, responsibilities and ethical obligations.

As stated by Thompson: "It's about a system that is void of integrity. Mistakes can happen. But if you don't do anything to stop them from happening again, you can't keep calling them mistakes." ■

State of Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign

Fighting the High Cost of Prison and Jail Phone Calls!

The Human Rights Defense Center (HRDC) has been reporting on the high cost of telephone calls from prisons, jails and other detention facilities in the U.S. for over two decades in its monthly publication Prison Legal News. An award of funds from the settlement in Judd v. AT&T, a prison phone-related lawsuit, has allowed us to launch the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign (WA PPJ). The goal of the campaign is to eliminate the kickbacks paid by telephone companies to detention facilities and to regulate the exorbitant rates charged to prisoners, their families and others who accept prison phone calls, including attorneys. Video visitation, which is following closely on the same path as the prison phone industry, has also been incorporated into the campaign.

HRDC co-founded the national Prison Phone Justice Campaign in 2011, which resulted in a historic vote by the FCC in August 2013 that capped the rates for interstate (long distance) prison phone calls at $.25/minute for collect calls and $.21/minute for debit and prepaid calls. Those rate caps became effective on February 11, 2014. While this has helped millions of families stay connected across state lines, it did nothing for prisoners incarcerated in Washington State who make local and intrastate (in-state) calls, estimated by the FCC to constitute 85% of all prison and jail calls.

Studies show that a prisoner's ability to communicate with family and friends while incarcerated results in a smoother transition upon release and reduces recidivism. However, excessive phone rates hamper and sometimes eliminate the ability of prisoners to stay in touch with their loved ones.

We need everyone affected by this issue, including prisoners' family members and attorneys, to sign on to the WA PPJ Campaign and tell us how they have been impacted by high prison and jail phone rates. This can be done by accessing the Campaign's website: www.wappj.org. Testimonials and video can be uploaded to the site, or people can call 1-877-410-4863 to record their comments. Or comments can be written and mailed to: HRDC, Attn: WA PPJ Campaign, P.O. Box 1151, Lake Worth, FL 33460. We also need billing records from prepaid accounts (2012 to current) for phone calls received from detention facilities, to demonstrate the actual rates charged to recipients of the calls. Billing records can be emailed to: cwilkinson@humanrightsdefensecenter.org.

Lastly, any donations to fund the campaign are both needed and appreciated; donations can be made at www.prisonphonejustice.org. Only with your support will we be able to end the abusively high costs of prison and jail phone calls in Washington State. Thank you for your support, and please tell others about the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign and encourage them to join!

Prosecutors Breaking Bad

THE FOLLOWING ARE VARIOUS CASES IN which prosecutors have reportedly engaged in misconduct, ethical violations or criminal behavior, which evidence the need for effective solutions to the persistent problem of prosecutorial abuses.

California

In 2012, the California Supreme Court overturned the death sentence of Miguel Bacigalupo based on a finding of prosecutorial misconduct. While leaving his murder convictions intact, the Court found that former prosecutor Joyce Allegro – who later became a judge – and her lead investigator had withheld evidence from Bacigalupo's attorneys that indicated a Columbian drug cartel had been involved in the murders.

That information would have bolstered Bacigalupo's defense that he had been forced to commit the murders because cartel members threatened to kill him and his family if he refused – a duress argument that may have spared him the death penalty. See: In re Bacigalupo, 55 Cal. 4th 312, 283 P.3d 613 (Cal. 2012).

As previously reported in PLN, embattled Del Norte County, California district attorney Jon Michael Alexander faced disbarment after he was found guilty of several counts of misconduct, including charges that he spoke to a defendant without her attorney present and then lied about it. [See: PLN, May 2013, p.48; Jan. 2013, p.46]. That incident was merely the latest of multiple complaints filed against Alexander. He was suspended by the County Board of Supervisors in April 2013; regardless, he said he would fight to keep his job.

"I am the elected DA of this county; I still believe that I am," he stated. "My job is to represent the people of this county as a prosecutor. I am not ready to relinquish that right."

On April 30, 2014, the State Bar Court recommended disbarment, noting the hearing judge found that Alexander had "committed acts of moral turpitude" by attempting to conceal his misconduct. "Alexander has been involved with the disciplinary system since 1994, yet he continues to commit misconduct, even while on probation and while serving as the chief law enforcement officer for Del Norte County," the Court wrote. Accordingly, he was "involuntarily enrolled as an inactive member of the State Bar" pending a final decision by the California Supreme Court.

On February 29, 2012, former Contra Costa County prosecutor Paul Sequeira filed a lawsuit in state court against Senior Deputy District Attorney Harold W. Jewett, accusing Jewett of assault and battery. The two men had argued about an election campaign in March 2010, leading Jewett to allegedly "sucker punch" Sequeira in the face. Jewett, who previously had been named "Prosecutor of the Year" by the California District Attorneys Association, was suspended for 30 days without pay – although he was later promoted. [See: PLN, May 2013, p.41; May 2010, p.50].

In May 2012, Sequiera received a $50,000 settlement from Contra Costa County after filing a claim for damages related to the incident.

District of Columbia

Former Assistant U.S. Attorney G. Paul Howes was accused of mishandling $42,000 in witness vouchers in the 1990s, giving the payments to relatives and girlfriends of informants, then trying to evade detection and punishment.

As a result of his misconduct the Department of Justice agreed to significantly reduce the sentences of at least nine defendants, including seven convicted of murder. The D.C. Bar's Board of Professional Responsibility merely recommended that Howes be suspended; however, in a rare rejection of such light discipline, in March 2012 the D.C. Court of Appeals held disbarment was "the only appropriate sanction" considering the scope of Howes' misconduct. He was the first federal prosecutor to be disbarred in over a decade. [See: PLN, March 2013, p.38].

Maine

Former state prosecutor James M. Cameron, 51, was convicted in 2010 on charges of sending, receiving and possessing child pornography, and sentenced to 16 years in federal prison. He was released pending an appeal after serving five months; however, he fled when seven of his 13 convictions were upheld by the First Circuit in 2012.

Captured in New Mexico 18 days later, he was returned to Maine. On October 17, 2014, the U.S. District Court held that Cameron now faces 24 to 30 years in prison due to his flight while on bail.

Massachusetts

When Internet activist Aaron Swartz, 26, was caught illegally downloading academic articles from MIT, federal prosecutors filed 13 charges that could have put him in prison for up to 35 years. They then offered Swartz a plea deal in which he would serve six months. Instead, Swartz committed suicide in 2013 and the prosecutors, including Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Heymann, were accused of inappropriately overcharging and using a lengthy prison term as leverage to force Swartz to plead guilty. [See: PLN, June 2013, p.56].

U.S. Senator John Cornyn questioned Attorney General Eric Holder about the case, asking, "Does it strike you as odd that the government would indict someone for crimes that would carry penalties of up to 35 years in prison and million dollar fines, and then offer him a three or four month prison sentence?"

Holder replied that he thought it was a "good use of prosecutorial discretion."

A complaint was filed against Heymann with the Office of Professional Responsibility; the outcome of the complaint is unknown, as the OPR does not disclose information about specific disciplinary cases.

Michigan

On August 16, 2012, a federal jury in Detroit found former Assistant Attorney General Andrew Shirvell guilty of stalking, defamation, intentional infliction of emotional distress and invasion of privacy in a civil suit filed by Chris Armstrong, the University of Michigan's first openly gay student body president. The jury awarded Armstrong $4.5 million in damages.

Shirvell had been fired from the Attorney General's office in 2010 after he "repeatedly violated office policies, engaged in borderline stalking behavior and inappropriately used state resources" to target Armstrong, because he objected to Armstrong's sexual orientation. He had also lied to investigators about his actions. [See: PLN, June 2013, p.43]. Shirvell appealed the jury verdict to the Sixth Circuit on October 10, 2013; his appeal remains pending.

New York

Darrell Dula, 25, was released from the Rikers Island jail in New York City in April 2012, where he had served ten months while facing a rape charge. In fact, the victim had recanted the rape accusation the day after she made it. She even signed a recantation, and had made similar allegations a year earlier that she had also recanted.

That information was not provided to Dula's defense counsel, however, leading to an indictment and Dula spending almost a year in jail pending trial. Prosecutor Abbie Greenberger said her boss, Lauren Hersh, had pressured her to proceed with the case. Greenberger claimed she was not aware of the recantation documents, which, after another prosecutor took over, were found to be missing from the case file.

The charges against Dula and three co-defendants were later dropped, and Dula filed separate lawsuits against the City of New York and the Kings County District Attorney's Office. Hersh resigned in May 2012 following an internal review by the DA's office that found she had acted inappropriately.

During a sworn deposition on December 19, 2013, former Brooklyn district attorney Charles J. Hynes admitted he had held witnesses in criminal cases against their will in hotel rooms – a practice he denied when he ran for reelection earlier that year.

"They were not free to leave; so sure, they were prisoners," he stated, though he later said he meant the courts were responsible, as judges had signed material witness warrants.

Hynes was deposed in a lawsuit filed by Jabbar Collins, who served 16 years in prison for murder before his conviction was reversed in 2010. A key witness in the case testified that the chief prosecutor, Michael F. Vecchione, had threatened to assault him or charge him with perjury if he didn't testify against Collins. The witness was kept in jail for a week, then held in a hotel room for another week under armed guard.

The federal court that reversed Collins' conviction called prosecutors' actions in the case "shameful," including their failure to inform defense counsel that witnesses had recanted their testimony or been held against their will. Vecchione announced his retirement from the DA's office in November 2013.

The New York Times reported in June 2014 that the city's Department of Investigation had issued findings that accused Hynes of using funds seized in criminal cases to pay a political consultant – a former DA employee – almost $220,000 to work on Hynes' unsuccessful reelection campaign. He had also hired state Supreme Court Justice Barry Kamins to assist with his campaign, which was a significant conflict of interest. Pursuant to an agreement with the state Commission on Judicial Conduct, Kamins agreed to retire from the bench. In August 2014, a grand jury began considering potential criminal charges against Hynes.

Collins settled his wrongful conviction suit against the City of New York and two police detectives for $10 million on September 19, 2014. He had previously settled a lawsuit against the state for $3 million. See: Collins v. City of New York, U.S.D.C. (E.D. NY), Case No. 1:11-cv-00766-FB-RML.

On March 21, 2014, Bronx Criminal Court Judge John Wilson sharply criticized assistant district attorney Megan Teesdale in a rape case involving defendant Segundo Marquez. Wilson accused Teesdale of failing to disclose that the victim initially told police she had consensual sex with Marquez in exchange for money.

The judge said it was the most "egregious" violation he had seen, stated Teesdale's conduct amounted to "gross negligence" and ordered her not to appear in his court again. The charges against Marquez were dropped after he had spent eight months in jail. Teesdale said the failure to disclose was a mistake due to multiple prosecutors handling the case.

Ironically, Judge Wilson is now facing an investigation by the State Commission on Judicial Misconduct for criticizing Teesdale and barring her from his courtroom. Teesdale reportedly did not face any discipline from the DA's office.

North Carolina

The badly botched prosecution of the 2006 Duke University lacrosse rape case resulted in the resignation of Durham County district attorney Mike Nifong. Despite a lack of evidence indicating their involvement in the alleged crime, three Duke lacrosse players were charged with rape, kidnapping and sexual offense. They were later exonerated.

Nifong was disbarred in June 2007 for ethics violations, including lying about DNA evidence that had been withheld by his office. He also was held in criminal contempt and served one day in jail. "Mr. Nifong did not act as a minister of justice, but as a minister of injustice," said Doug Brocker, an attorney with the North Carolina State Bar.

Oklahoma

Oklahoma prisoner Michelle Murphy, 37, was exonerated and released in May 2014 after serving 20 years of a life sentence for murdering her infant son. According to an October 12, 2014 Tulsa World news report, Tulsa County prosecutor Tim Harris told jurors at Murphy's trial that "police found someone's blood near her slain baby's body – blood he implied could be hers."

However, according to Murphy's attorneys, at the time of the trial Harris had a report from the Oklahoma State Bureau of Investigation that indicated the blood found at the crime scene had a different blood type than Murphy's.

Harris argued he did not withhold evidence and had shown the report to Murphy's defense team – a claim they disputed. He opposed a request to unseal documents in the case.

“There was so much misconduct. So much exculpatory evidence that was not produced. There was a great deal of deception,” said one of Murphy’s appellate attorneys, Sharisse O’Carroll.

Harris has not been disciplined in connection with the case, though he announced in November 2013 that he would not seek re-election.

Tennessee

On December 23, 2013, the Tennessee Supreme Court publicly censured Shelby County assistant district attorney Thomas D. Henderson for misconduct in a death penalty case, following a complaint filed by the Office of the Tennessee Post-Conviction Defender. Henderson was accused of failing to tell defense counsel about an eyewitness who saw two other suspects with blood on their hands at the crime scene, and who identified one of those suspects in a photo lineup. He did not pick the photo of the defendant, Michael Dale Rimmer, who was later convicted of murder and sentenced to death.

When Rimmer’s attorneys asked for Brady materials prior to trial, instead of producing the eyewitness report and identification of another suspect, Henderson wrote: “[T]he State of Tennessee is now unaware of any evidence which tends to exculpate the defendant of the crime charged against him.”

Henderson agreed to the censure, and was also ordered to pay $1,745.07 for the cost of the misconduct investigation. Rimmer’s murder conviction was overturned in 2012; he faces a retrial, and the Shelby County District Attorney’s Office has recused itself from his case, calling it a “distraction.” Meanwhile, Rimmer remains on death row.

Texas

During a 2012 trial involving a defendant accused of injuring a child, then-Polk County assistant district attorney Kaycee Jones and the judge over the case, Elizabeth Coker, exchanged ex parte texts about the prosecution’s trial strategy. Judge Coker apparently initiated the texts, and Jones relayed them to the lead prosecutor.

The incident was reported by another member of the prosecution team, and in May 2014, Jones – now a state district judge – received a public reprimand and $650 fine from the Texas Bar Association. She agreed to the reprimand, which cited her for “professional misconduct” for inappropriate communication with Judge Coker, who resigned from the bench in December 2013 amid a judicial misconduct investigation.

Jones’ sanction was widely criticized as being overly lenient, particularly since she was suspected of engaging in ex parte communications with Coker in other cases, too.

Utah

On July 14, 2014, John Swallow and Mark Shurtleff, both former Utah Attorneys General, were arrested by agents with the FBI and Utah Department of Public Safety and charged with numerous state felony offenses that included tampering with evidence, taking bribes, obstructing justice, misuse of public funds and making false statements.

The charges center on relationships Shurtleff and Swallow had with wealthy defendants, including Jeremy Johnson and Marc Sessions Jenson. Shurtleff allegedly used Johnson’s private plane to fly to California and New York, while Swallow is accused of using Johnson’s houseboat and Ferrari while serving in the Attorney General’s office.

Johnson faced federal fraud charges, and Jenson had been charged with securities fraud. The criminal charges against Swallow and Shurtleff remain pending.

West Virginia

As part of a corruption investigation involving public officials in Mingo County, West Virginia, prosecutor Michael Sparks was charged with conspiring to conceal drug-related activities that involved county sheriff Eugene Crum, by violating the constitutional rights of a defendant who had planned to testify against the sheriff.

Sparks resigned in October 2013 and was disbarred. [See: PLN, Nov. 2013, p.42]. He subsequently pleaded guilty, and on July 7, 2014 was sentenced to one year in prison followed by a year on probation, plus a $500 fine. ■

by Paul Wright

OVER THE PAST 24 YEARS PLN HAS reported extensively on the structural dynamics of the American police state, which have resulted in the imprisonment of over 2.3 million people on any given day. Critical to mass incarceration is a quick assembly-line judicial process with little regard to whatever nominal rights people may have under various constitutions or statutes.

Thus, for mass incarceration to be successful, poor defendants need to be deprived of effective legal counsel; crime labs need to be dedicated to producing evidence that results in convictions and not engaged in independent scientific endeavors; the judiciary must be compliant with and complicit in the goal of obtaining convictions at any cost; and prosecutors have to be allowed to do whatever they feel is necessary to win cases. Which is essentially how the U.S. criminal justice system operates.

As anyone who observes our justice system knows, prosecutorial misconduct is rampant, pervasive and goes relatively unpunished; presumably, if abuses by prosecutors were adequately reported and sanctioned, they would be a rarity. Yet courts continue to find misconduct on a disturbingly regular basis. As this month's cover story makes clear, this is a systemic problem that requires systemic solutions.

On October 22, 2014, the Federal Communications Commission issued a second Further Notice of Proposed Rule-making on reforms to Inmate Calling Services (ICS). PLN co-founded the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice in 2011 and has pressured the FCC to regulate the high cost of prison phone calls. Beginning last year, they finally started doing so.

We need your help to get the FCC to implement meaningful ICS reforms by capping the cost of intrastate (in-state) prison and jail phone calls, as well as eliminating "commission" kickbacks to corrections agencies and ancillary fees. See the ad on p.2 for what you and your family can do to support the Campaign.

One way to help is to make a donation to Prison Legal News and the Human Rights Defense Center, the non-profit organization that publishes PLN. For the past three years we have dedicated all our fundraising to the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice, to achieve ICS reforms and regulation. We are the only organization submitting detailed information and hard data to the FCC on the actual cost of prison phone calls and commission kickbacks.

Collecting, analyzing and making this information publicly available is extremely time consuming and expensive. The few modest grants we received to help start the Campaign ran out long ago and we urgently need your support to continue the struggle for prison phone justice. All of your donations, no matter how large or small, will be used to further our advocacy efforts.

To learn more about prison phone justice, visit www.prisonphonejustice.org, which contains the phone contracts, rates and commission data for the prison systems in all 50 states, the federal Bureau of Prisons and a number of jails. To get involved in the Campaign, visit www.phonejustice.org, or for our Washington State campaign, www.wappj.org.

If you believe prisoners and their families should not be price-gouged and exploited by greedy telecom companies and their government allies, then please make a donation to help end these egregious practices. If you benefited from the FCC's cap on interstate prison and jail phone rates, then please consider donating the money you saved so we can finish the fight and cap the rates for in-state calls, too.

All PLN subscribers will soon receive our annual fundraiser letter, which will give our readers a better idea of what we do on behalf of prisoners and their families. You can donate to support our work by mailing a check or money order, or by phone or online using a credit card. Please encourage others to donate as well.

You can also purchase gift subscriptions to PLN individually or in bulk through our Subscription Madness campaign. See the ad on p.31 for details.

Since we re-launched Subscription Madness, which allows the discounted purchase of multiple gift subscriptions for people who have never been a PLN subscriber before, we have received some complaints from long-time subscribers because the discount is not available for renewals. The purpose of Subscription Madness is to grow our subscriber base so we can keep our costs down; we hope that after reading PLN for a year, new subscribers will want to renew at our regular subscription rates.

We spend a lot of time and resources on expanding our subscriber base, and with Subscription Madness we pass along the savings of not having to mail sample copies to potential subscribers by not increasing our rates. But the Subscription Madness promotion is not intended to be a slight to our long-time subscribers, to whom we offer other benefits for multi-year renewals, including free books or extra issues of PLN.

Lastly, with the holiday season approaching, consider giving friends and loved ones a gift subscription to PLN or some of the many books we distribute. Our next self-published title, the Disciplinary Self-Help Litigation Manual by Dan Manville, is currently in production and will be available soon. You can order it now for $49.95, shipping included – see the ad on p.11.

Enjoy this issue of PLN and please encourage others to donate and subscribe.

Death Sentences Reversed Due to Prosecutorial Misconduct

by Christopher Zoukis

DEATH SENTENCES IMPOSED ON PRISONERS in Arizona, Virginia and Tennessee have been reversed by federal appellate courts as a result of misconduct by prosecutors – including withholding evidence and making improper closing arguments.

Abuses by Arizona Prosecutors

AN ARIZONA PRISONER WHO SPENT MORE than two decades on death row after allegedly confessing to a police detective that she participated in the 1989 murder of her 4-year-old son was released on $250,000 bond on September 6, 2013.

Debra Jean Milke, 50, was freed after the detective who claimed she confessed to him stated he would refuse to testify at Milke's retrial, citing his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

Retired Phoenix police detective Armando Saldate, Jr. invoked his Fifth Amendment rights after the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit vacated Milke's death sentence in March 2013 and directed the clerk to send copies of the opinion to federal authorities for "possible investigation into whether Detective Saldate's conduct ... amounts to a pattern of violating the federally protected rights of Arizona residents."

The appellate court's ruling came after Milke learned that prosecutors had withheld information about at least eight cases in which confessions, indictments or convictions had been thrown out because Saldate lied under oath or committed other misconduct.

Saldate's credibility was essential to the case presented by the Maricopa County District Attorney's Office, because he claimed that Milke had confessed to taking part in her son's murder during an interrogation in a closed room. His interview with Milke was not recorded, and Saldate told the jury he had destroyed his notes of the interview.

Milke denied ever making such a statement, but the jury was not informed of Saldate's history of lying under oath. As the confession was the only direct evidence against Milke, the Court of Appeals reversed her conviction.

"No civilized system of justice should have to depend on such flimsy evidence, quite possibly tainted by dishonesty or overzealousness, to decide whether to take someone's life or liberty," wrote Ninth Circuit Judge Alex Kozinski. See: Milke v. Ryan, 711 F.3d 998 (9th Cir. 2013).

Saldate's refusal to testify in a retrial likely means Milke's confession will not be admitted, and without it "there's really no case" noted her attorney, Michael Kimerer.

Milke was convicted on charges of murder, kidnapping, conspiracy and child abuse on October 12, 1990 – less than a year after her housemate, James Styers, and another man drove her son, Christopher, to a secluded ravine and shot him three times in the head, allegedly to collect on a life insurance policy. Milke had sent her son with Styers to see Santa Claus at a mall on the day the 4-year-old was murdered. Styers and a co-defendant were convicted of first-degree murder and sentenced to death.

Milke's retrial is scheduled for January 2015; she has challenged the second trial on double jeopardy grounds, citing prosecutorial misconduct. Saldate may be forced by the court to testify.

Death Sentence Vacated in Virginia

JUSTIN M. WOLFE, A VIRGINIA PRISONER convicted of capital murder in 2002, won a new trial after a federal district court overturned his conviction and death sentence in December 2012. The court found that prosecutors had engaged in gross misconduct by failing to disclose that the triggerman in the case had been encouraged to testify that Wolfe hired him to shoot rival drug dealer Danny Robert Petrole, Jr.

U.S. District Court Judge Raymond A. Jackson found the prosecution's conduct so egregious that he not only vacated Wolfe's conviction and ordered his release, but also prohibited the Commonwealth of Virginia from re-prosecuting him for the murder of Petrole if any such prosecution involved the testimony of triggerman Owen M. Barber IV. Barber admitted to investigators that he had presented false testimony to avoid the death penalty himself.

While Judge Jackson's re-prosecution order was later overturned by the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, retrying Wolfe without Barber's testimony would be "tenuous" at best, according to Jackson. In May 2013, the Fourth Circuit affirmed the district court's order that Wolfe be released from prison pending any retrial. See: Wolfe v. Clarke, 718 F.3d 277 (4th Cir. 2013), cert. denied.

The Commonwealth's prosecution team was found to have engaged in a wide array of misconduct in prosecuting Wolfe for the March 2001 murder of Petrole, the son of a retired Secret Service agent and the kingpin of one of Virginia's largest-ever drug rings. That misconduct included choreographing and coordinating witnesses' testimony, withholding tapes of witness interviews from the defense and knowingly allowing false testimony to be introduced at trial.

According to Judge Jackson, Prince William County Commonwealth's Attorney Paul B. Ebert – who has sent more defendants to death row in Virginia than any other prosecutor – failed to turn over a report showing it was police detectives who first introduced the idea to Barber that Wolfe masterminded the murder of Petrole, and who gave Barber the option of implicating Wolfe or facing the death penalty. Ebert's staff had suppressed evidence indicating that Barber confessed to his roommate that he had acted alone, the court found.

In 2005, Barber signed an affidavit swearing that he was offered a plea bargain that spared him the death penalty if he falsely testified that Wolfe had hired him to kill Petrole.

"Justin had nothing to do with the killing ... I lied and implicated Justin because I felt I had no choice ... I had to choose between falsely testifying against Justin or dying," he said. Barber received 38 years in prison after testifying against Wolfe.

Wolfe's attorneys have alleged that as late as September 2012, Ebert and another prosecutor, Richard Conway, threatened Barber during a jailhouse visit, telling him he could face the death penalty for recanting his testimony, which violated his plea agreement.

"The Commonwealth's representatives incessantly bombarded Mr. Barber with both veiled and overt threats of re-prosecution, suggestive statements about how they knew what the real truth was, attempts to turn Mr. Barber against attorneys who represented him ... and emotional pleas involving religion,” Wolfe’s defense counsel stated.

Wolfe had spent over a decade on death row; he was denied bond after being re-indicted for Petrole’s murder, and remains incarcerated pending another trial.

Ebert, who has recused himself from the case, had previously been criticized by the Fourth Circuit in another death penalty case involving John Allen Muhammad, one of the D.C. Beltway snipers, for withholding evidence from defense attorneys. The appellate court held that the withheld evidence was not material in that case, and Muhammad was executed in 2009.

Tennessee Prosecutor Made Improper Remarks

A PROSECUTOR’S OVER-THE-TOP CLOSING statement during a capital trial’s sentencing phase – which included comparing the defendant to “the devil incarnate” and referencing cannibal murderer Jeffrey Dahmer, the Lord’s Prayer and other inappropriate comments – resulted in a new sentencing hearing for Ronnie M. Cauthern, convicted of raping and killing an Army nurse in 1987.

Cauthern’s death sentence was vacated by a panel of the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals on November 14, 2013, which also found that his defense attorney failed to present a coherent defense during the sentencing phase.

Cauthern’s resentencing will be his third for the murder of Rosemary Smith, a captain in the U.S. Army Nurse Corps, who was killed along with her husband, Patrick Smith, also an Army captain and nurse. Cauthern’s initial death sentence was set aside after a judge improperly allowed jurors to hear a post-arrest statement Cauthern made to the police, and he was again sentenced to death in 1995.

The murders of the Smiths at their home in Clarksville, Tennessee were gruesome, according to then-Assistant Attorney General Steve Garrett, who appeared for the state in the 1995 resentencing hearing. Cauthern and a co-defendant allegedly placed Rosemary Smith in a closet and forced her to listen as her husband was killed in the next room. She was then raped and strangled with a scarf in a “protracted event” that resulted in her death.

In his closing arguments during the sentencing phase, Garrett invoked the name of the devil several times and referred to Cauthern as “the evil one” who “appeared in Minnesota in the form of Jeffrey Dahmer and ... appeared at the door of Patrick and Rosemary Smith.”

He continued: “You cannot negotiate with the evil one, ladies and gentlemen. You cannot deal in good faith with the evil one. You have got to destroy and destroy, or he and his benefactors will destroy you. He’ll destroy us. He’ll destroy our children. The evil one took the name of Ronnie Cauthern on that day. That was his name, and he’s beyond redemption.... Engage him in combat and destroy him. Do your duty....”

Garrett also invoked the Lord’s Prayer and The Rolling Stones’ song “Sympathy for the Devil,” and suggested the jury could “send a message to the evil one.”

The Tennessee Supreme Court found that those closing remarks did not unfairly prejudice Cauthern, though it did caution prosecutors against making similar statements in the future. A U.S. District Court judge apparently agreed, noting, among other points, that Garrett’s comments “were not likely to have convinced the jury that [Cauthern] was, in fact, the devil incarnate.”

In reversing the district court, Sixth Circuit Judge Eric Clay wrote, “While that may be true, its real relevance is that it highlights the outlandish nature of the prosecutor’s remarks ... one would need not to believe that [Cauthern] was himself the devil in order to be improperly inflamed such that the verdict cannot be trusted.”

Accordingly, Cauthern’s death sentence was reversed and the case remanded to the state trial court for resentencing. See: Cauthern v. Bell, 2013 U.S. App. LEXIS 22944 (6th Cir. 2013), rehearing and rehearing en banc denied. ■

SUBSCRIPTION MADNESS 2014

Our Subscription Madness promotion has been so successful in the past that we have decided to offer it again!

PLN is offering a discount on blocks of 2 or 4 one-year subscriptions for any person not a current or former subscriber who has a U.S. address, whether they are imprisoned or not. Subscription Madness is the only opportunity attorneys, librarians and corrections professionals have to receive a PLN subscription at a fraction of the normal rate of $90 per year, and for prisoner family members and concerned activists to subscribe at a steep discount from the normal rate of $35 per year. Prisoner subscriptions are also less than the normal $30 per year. Check out these discounts!

- $50 buys 2 one-year subscriptions ($25 each)
- $80 buys 4 one-year subscriptions ($20 each)

If you want to take advantage of Subscription Madness but are stumped for people to send them to, PLN can provide names of indigent prisoners who would love a PLN subscription. Use a separate piece of paper to order by mail, call our office to order with a credit card, or go to our website to order online. No Renewals! Sorry, but Subscription Madness is for new one-year subscriptions only, and cannot be used to renew or extend a current or former subscription. PLN is a 501(c)(3) non-profit. (Subscription Madness 2014 expires 12-31-2014).

Wells Fargo Bankrolls Private Prison Companies, Immigrant Detention

WHILE WELLS FARGO & COMPANY has sold off much of the stock it once owned in private prison company GEO Group amid a divestment campaign targeting the multi-billion-dollar bank, it has concurrently increased its shares in Corrections Corporation of America (CCA).

After initially selling off around 33% of its holdings in GEO Group stock in 2012, Wells Fargo continued to divest from GEO in the mutual funds it controlled. As of June 30, 2014, the bank owned 7,425 shares of GEO valued at over $272,000; previously, it had owned 4 million shares. However, Wells Fargo has steadily increased its stake in CCA and owned 1.08 million shares in the company valued at $36.6 million as of June 30, 2014.

Peter Cervantes-Gautschi, executive director of Enlace, a non-profit organization that has convened a National Private Prison Divestment Campaign, congratulated the bank on “its well-advised decision to dump the private prison stock” in GEO Group. He called on the financial industry giant to “rid itself of the rest of its private prison holdings and to cease financing private prison companies.”

A divestment campaign protest outside a Wells Fargo branch in Nashville, Tennessee on July 1, 2011 involved a sidewalk demonstration and participants closing their accounts at the bank, including PLN managing editor Alex Friedmann. Similar protests were held in at least 13 other cities.

A September 2012 report issued by two watchdog groups identified Wells Fargo as the “issuing lender” on CCA’s $785 million line of credit and the bookkeeper for $300 million of GEO Group’s corporate debt. The joint report, by National People’s Action and the Public Accountability Initiative, also noted that Management and Training Corporation (MTC), the nation’s third-largest private prison firm, borrows money from Wells Fargo.

The report argued that with those millions in loans and investments, private prison companies are able to shape immigration policy by influencing lawmakers – e.g., through political lobbying and campaign donations.

Both GEO Group and CCA operate immigrant detention facilities. According to filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the companies rely heavily on revenue from detention contracts with Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE).

“As a major investor in and lender to the private prison industry, Wells Fargo is at the center of the industry’s vicious cycle,” the report stated. “This cycle involves profiting from the detention of vulnerable immigrant communities by understaffing the prisons and cutting costs so that basic food and medical needs are not met.” If the bank withdrew its support, “this cycle would break down.”

Wells Fargo disputed the report’s findings, however, and defended its lending practices by claiming that it’s just one of several banks – acting on behalf of third-party investors – that do business with CCA, GEO and MTC. Other major institutional investors in GEO Group include Credit Suisse, Vanguard Group, Eagle Asset Management, FMR, Ameriprise Financial and State Street.

Further, the bank argued that it owned private prison stock through its mutual funds, not directly. According to Wells Fargo spokesman Alan Elias, fund managers “must make investment decisions for the benefit of investors and independent of the interests of Wells Fargo Bank.” In an email sent to Progress Illinois, Elias explained that, by law, mutual funds are “segregated” from Wells Fargo’s own assets; thus, it has no personal stake in the for-profit prison industry.

The bank’s website goes further in defending its position on human rights, stating: “Wells Fargo recognizes that governments have the duty to protect human rights, and our company has a responsibility to respect human rights. To that end, we strive to respect human rights throughout our operations, products and services.”

Ironically, Wells Fargo has targeted Hispanics as new bank customers at the same time it provides financial services to and invests in private prison companies that operate immigration detention centers.

“Wells Fargo invests a lot of money in marketing to the Latino communities,” noted Nicole Melaku with Rights for All People, an immigrant-rights organization. “But the investment in the GEO Group has all sorts of conflicts of values for a company that prides itself on integrity.”

Kevin Connor, director of the Public Accountability Initiative, said Wells Fargo is the only major bank with strong ties to the three largest private prison companies. He also challenged the bank’s willingness to do business with them.

“From any sort of moral and ethical perspective, supplying critical financing to this industry is wrong,” Connor stated. “If you look at Wells Fargo’s own marketing materials, they claim to be responsible in their business practices. [But] this is clearly an irresponsible use of their customers’ money.”

The joint watchdog report also documented abuses inside private prisons, the industry’s negative impact on the U.S. economy and Wells Fargo’s past responses to community pressure. In 1977, for example, the bank loaned millions to the South African government despite its egregious practice of apartheid. It took seven years before Wells Fargo succumbed to protests and refused to renew or make new loans to South Africa until apartheid ended. ■

Prison Systems Increasingly Provide Email – For a Price

by Derek Gilna

PRISON OFFICIALS AND CORRECTIONS experts have long recognized that helping prisoners maintain contact with the outside world decreases the stress, isolation and loneliness that are part of the inherent nature of incarceration. Further, regular communication with those outside of prison can help prisoners successfully reenter society following their release, resulting in lower recidivism rates. [See: PLN, April 2014, p.24].

In addition to the usual methods of communication such as phone calls, in-person visits and postal mail, a growing number of states have joined the federal Bureau of Prisons in providing email services for prisoners. [See: PLN, Dec. 2009, p.24].

For example, the Minnesota Department of Corrections established a modified email system in 2012 that allows prisoners to receive emails from approved outside parties. The emails are received on computers in prison mailrooms, printed and then delivered to prisoners with their regular mail. There is no direct access to the Internet.

Iowa-based Advanced Technologies Group (ATG) signed a contract with Minnesota to provide the prison-based email service after operating a six-month pilot program. The company also supplies secure email services to the Bureau of Prisons through the Corrlinks system.

Responding to those who question why prisoners deserve access to email, ATG CEO Atul Gupta said, “People think that you’re doing these things for inmates who really shouldn’t be getting anything. You’re giving them email ... [but] it’s not really email. It’s a communications system.”

“We’re getting them ready for society,” he added. “Otherwise, they’re going to come right back, and that’s not what we want.”

Gupta noted that the email service doesn’t cost the prison system or taxpayers anything, as either the prisoners or those who contact them via email pay for the service.

“Most states, what they will do is, they will look at it in terms of saying, ‘Hey, can we generate some revenue? Let’s do that,’” he said.

How is that revenue generated? The same way that corrections agencies make money from prison phone services – by receiving a portion of the income from the company, in the form of a “commission” or kickback.

In Minnesota prisons, email messages cost $.30, with $.10 going to ATG and $.20 going to the state. People can send messages to Minnesota prisoners through the email system but prisoners cannot respond via email, unlike in some other states.

In addition to Minnesota and the federal prison system, ATG provides email services for state prisoners in Iowa and Oklahoma, plus one immigration detention facility. The company’s largest competitor is JPay, which supplies a variety of services to prison systems, including money transfers, video visitation, MP3 downloads and email.

As of April 2014, JPay provided email services for state prisons in Colorado, Indiana, Kansas, Louisiana, Michigan, Georgia (women’s prisons only), Missouri (certain prisons only), Nevada, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Texas, Washington and Virginia (certain prisons only), plus several county jails and individual facilities.

In many of those states, prisoners can send as well as receive emails; family members access the email system online, while prisoners use special kiosks in their housing units. In some cases, photos or short video files can be attached to the messages – for an additional fee.

Prisoners and those who want to communicate with them via email buy “stamps” to send each message, which cost from $.17 to $.60 each depending on the prison system and the number of stamps purchased; the average price per email is $.40 to $.50.

As with ATG, JPay has a commission-based business model, in which it provides a portion of its revenue to the contracting agency. In Tennessee, for example, under a proposed fee schedule attached to a 2012 contract, JPay offered to provide prison email services for $.40 per message with the state receiving 4% of the revenue.

Other companies that provide email services to prisons and jails include Smart Jail Mail (which charges $.50 per message), ICSolutions, and prison phone service providers Securus and Global Tel*Link.

The growing number of states that provide prisoners with access to email is a reflection of today’s increasingly digitally-connected world, where electronic communication has become the norm. The main difference is that outside of prison, email is free. ■

Repackaging Mass Incarceration

by James Kilgore

SINCE MY COUNTERPUNCH ARTICLE IN November 2013, which assessed the state of the movement against mass incarceration, the rumblings of change in the criminal justice system have steadily grown louder. Attorney General Eric Holder has continued to stream his mild-mannered critique by raising the issue of felony disenfranchisement;* the President has stepped forward with a proposal for clemency for people with drug offenses that could free hundreds. In the media, we've seen a scathing attack on America's addiction to punishment in The New York Times and the American Academy of Sciences has released perhaps the most comprehensive critique of mass incarceration to date, the 464-page The Growth of Incarceration in the United States: Exploring Causes and Consequences.

In late May 2014, several dozen conservatives including Newt Gingrich, Grover Norquist and former NRA president David Keene pulled together the first Right on Crime (ROC) Leadership Summit in Washington, D.C. The ROC, an organization which boasts a coterie of members with impeccable right-wing credentials, reiterated the need for conservatives to drive the process of prison reform. The conference's "call to action" argued: "In our earnest desire to have safer neighborhoods, policy responses to crime have too often neglected core conservative values – government accountability, personal responsibility, family preservation, victim restoration, fiscal discipline, limited government and free enterprise."

Gingrich engaged in similar kinds of soul searching: "Once you decide everybody in prison is also an American then you gotta really reach into your own heart and ask, is this the best we can do?"

All of this has precipitated another round of optimistic cries about the possibilities of a left-right coalition on mass incarceration, including a high-profile Time Magazine op-ed co-authored by Norquist and MoveOn.org co-founder Joan Blades.

While the spirit of reconciliation in criminal justice attracts most of the media attention, a number of pieces have also emerged rejecting any rush to positive judgment. For example, fellows at the Brennan Center compiled a statistically based report which contends that carceral change has not yet turned the corner, while Black Agenda Report co-founder Bruce Dixon asserted that Obama's clemency measures would have no significant impact on mass incarceration.

However, another process, likely at least as important in the long run as number crunching, coalitions or clemency, also has been gaining steam. The official voices of incarceration – politicians, corrections officials, private prison operators, prison guards unions and county sheriffs – are exploring changing discourse and cosmetic reform in order to avoid systemic restructuring. In the business world, they call this repackaging.

Repackaging Mass Incarceration: Carceral Humanism

CURRENTLY THIS REPACKAGING ASSUMES several forms. One of the most important is carceral humanism or what some people refer to as incarceration lite. Carceral humanism recasts the jailers as caring social service providers. The cutting edge of carceral humanism is the field of mental health. According to a recent report by the Treatment Advocacy Center, in 2012 the U.S. had over 350,000 people with serious mental health issues in prisons and jails as compared to just 35,000 in the remaining state mental health facilities. Prisons and jails have become the new asylums and jailers are waking up to the fact that mental health facilities also represent a new cash cow.

Likely the most important examples of carceral humanism are happening in California. There, Governor Jerry Brown has played a shell game called realignment in which he's transferred thousands of people from state facilities to county jails in order to comply with a federal court order to reduce the state prison population. To help counties adapt to all these new prisoners, the governor gave $500 million to the state's sheriffs to build extensions onto their jails. In response, the sheriffs had to come to Sacramento to pitch for a slice of that money. They didn't come talking about public safety. Their mantra focused on caring-providing opportunities and improved circumstances for those in custody. The Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation's summary from Lake County, one of the 15 winners out of 36 submissions, is illustrative: "$20 million for a new Type II, 40-bed women's jail with a new stand alone 39-bed Medical/Mental Health Services building with program space, a new administration building, and renovations so that existing space can accommodate programs."

The new jails are about institutionalizing the funding of mental health and other services behind the walls, further diverting money from the already bare-bones social services in communities. The Lake County proposal also featured another prominent strain of carceral humanism – a women's jail, or in the present corrections jargon, a "gender-responsive" facility. Since mainstream research now argues that women experience incarceration differently than men, law enforcement is waving the gender banner to access more funding for construction. Los Angeles lies at the cutting edge in this regard. In March 2014, the LA Board of Supervisors authorized $5.5 million for consultants to draw up a plan for what some law enforcement people are calling a "women's village." Deputy Sheriff Terri McDonald of Los Angeles suggested that the new facility could be a place where "women and children could serve their time together."

Carceral humanism has also surfaced in the repackaging of immigration detention centers. The latest immigration prisons carry the label "civil detention" centers. The GEO Group, the nation's second-largest private prison operator, opened its latest such facility in Karnes, Texas. The LA Times called it a “pleasant surprise for illegal immigrants.” Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) officials boast that people detained in Karnes won’t be housed in cells but in “suites” holding eight people. Those detained will be supervised not by guards or correctional officers but by “resident advisers.”

Repackaging 2: Non-Alternative Alternatives to Incarceration

A SECOND FORM OF REPACKAGING MASS incarceration falls under the heading of non-alternative alternatives to incarceration. These non-alternatives purport to change things but in essence simply perpetuate the culture of punishment. The most common forms of these are drug courts, mental health courts and day reporting centers. While many of these may be well-intentioned and in some cases have positive effects, they typically involve heavy monitoring of a person’s behavior, including frequent drug testing, limitations on movement and association, a whole range of involuntary but supposedly therapeutic programs of dubious value and very little margin of error to avoid reincarceration. Perhaps the most extreme example of a non-alternative alternative to incarceration, and one which is likely to gain increasing traction, is electronic monitoring.

While advocates claim electronic monitoring facilitates employment, building family ties and participation in community activities, my interviews with a number of people on a monitor have revealed a different experience. Jean-Pierre Shackelford, who spent two years on an ankle bracelet in Columbus, Ohio said that he felt like his probation officer had him in a “choke hold” while he was on an ankle bracelet. He labeled monitoring “another form of control and slavery, 21st century electronic style.” Shaun Harris, on a monitor for a year in Michigan, called it a form of privatized incarceration; “it’s like you just turned my family’s house into another cell” was his comment.

Shackelford and Harris, like many others I spoke with, both reported difficulty getting movement for family activities and a lack of clarity about what was and wasn’t permitted. Shackelford finally took to going to church because that seemed to be the only activity his probation officer would approve. Both Shackelford and Harris, like most people interviewed, complained that they could be put on 24-hour “lockdown” (meaning they couldn’t leave the house at all) for any reason for an indefinite period and there would be no way to appeal such a decision. Even a late return home from work due to a delay in public transportation could result in a re-arrest. To make matters worse, most electronic monitors come with a daily user fee which ranges anywhere from five to twenty dollars a day.

While the punitive nature of ankle bracelet regimes is a cause for concern, the potential to implement exclusion zones with GPS-based monitors contains more serious long-term implications. Exclusion zones are places where monitors are programmed not to let people go. At the moment, authorities mainly use exclusion zones to keep individuals with a sex offense history away from schools and parks. But such zones have the potential to become new ways to reconstruct the space of our cities, to keep the good people in and the bad people out. This technology, which can be set up via smart phones, holds the possibility to turn houses, buildings, even neighborhoods into self-financing sites of incarceration.

In the meantime, firms like the GEO Group, which owns BI Incorporated, the nation's largest provider of electronic monitoring technology and backup services, are experimenting with new target groups for ankle bracelets. In parts of California and Texas they've used electronic monitors on kids with school truancy records. Under a $370 million contract, BI already has thousands of people awaiting immigration adjudication on monitors. Packaged as an alternative, these bracelets actually represent a new horizon for incarceration, finding ways to do it cheaper with technology through the private sector and then getting the user to pay, likely a model that would line up squarely with Right on Crime's notions of reform.

Repackaging: Why Now?

MOST COMMENTATORS ATTRIBUTE THE spirit of change in criminal justice to a belated recognition of the fundamental irrationality of spending so much money locking up so many people for so long. As Grover Norquist put it, "Conservatives may have wanted more incarceration than was necessary in the past, so what we're trying to do is find out about what works."

Such analyses make perfect sense but they also ignore a big picture political question. Mass incarceration is becoming a flash point of rebellion and resistance, with African American communities the most visible hot spot. Mass incarceration and the racialized vagaries of criminal justice have been going on for decades but recently we've seen new levels of anger and frustration in reaction to the deaths of Trayvon Martin and Oscar Grant, as well as to the sentencing of Marissa Alexander. Even mainstream Black commentators like Melissa Harris-Perry appear incensed. At the grassroots level we've witnessed campaigns against stop-and-frisk, solitary confinement, mandatory minimums, crack cocaine laws and a host of new jails and prisons.

On the ideological plane, the notion of the New Jim Crow, categorizing mass incarceration as a new form of slavery and segregation, is catching on. People are latching onto the idea of mass incarceration as a systemic problem that can only be solved with a vast redirecting of resources into the communities that have been devastated by imprisonment. In other words, mass incarceration requires a total paradigm shift. The situation has the potential to explode. Politicians and business people don't like explosions. When explosions appear to be a genuine possibility it is time to talk reform, time to repackaging.

To make matters worse for purveyors of the carceral status quo, the immigrants' rights movement has also been erupting over the last decade. From the immigrant worker strikes and demonstrations of 2006 to the endless string of demonstrations by the Dreamers and the Dream Defenders in the face of continued mass deportations, a steady stream of unrest has materialized. With the changing national demographics, key players in criminal justice need to be seen to be doing something if they want to maintain their power.

Lastly, there is the movement inside the prisons themselves. The hunger strikes at Pelican Bay in California and in Washington's Northwest Detention Center, coupled with the outpouring of solidarity these actions prompted, pose a serious threat to the already heavily-smeared image of U.S. prisons. In addition, even once-notorious political prisoners are gaining increasing legitimacy. Captives from across several generations are attracting large coterie of supporters. This includes high-profile individuals who have served decades behind bars, individuals like Mumia Abu-Jamal, Albert Woodfox, Oscar Lopez Rivera, Russell Maroon Shoatz and Leonard Peltier, along with more contemporary prisoners like Lynne Stewart (recently released), Marie Mason and Chelsea Manning. Inside and beyond the walls, there is rebellion in the air.

This reality raises another question: whether a left-right coalition can deliver even enough change to calm the waters. Mass incarceration has become such a fundamental part of how the U.S. addresses issues of race, crime, poverty, gender and inequality, it appears unlikely to collapse from gradual reforms whether inspired by carceral humanism, punitive alternatives to incarceration or more genuine critique. As with civil rights, pressure from below will be required from a social movement that has the creativity to envision an alternative, the skills and legitimacy to mobilize the people who are most directly affected, and the political power to make their voices be heard and get others to join them. Perhaps this social movement is, to borrow a phrase from the Spanish poet Antonio Machado, making the path by walking at this very moment. ■

PLN FUNDRAISER 2014

*Please Support Prison Legal News
and the Human Rights Defense Center!*

Prison Legal News, a project of the non-profit Human Rights Defense Center, cannot fund its operations through subscriptions and book sales alone. We rely on donations from our readers and supporters – like you!

PLN conducts just one fundraiser a year; we don't bombard our readers with donation requests, we only ask that if you are able to contribute something to our important work, please do so. Every dollar counts and is greatly appreciated and will be put to good use. No donation is too small, even books of stamps!

Where does your donation go? Here's some of what we've done in the past year:

- HRDC, a co-founder and leader of the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice, was instrumental in getting the Federal Communications Commission to reduce the cost of prison phone calls, which the FCC did when caps on interstate prison phone rates went into effect in February 2014!
- PLN settled censorship suits against jails in Ventura County, California; Upshur and Comal County, Texas; and Kenosha County, Wisconsin. In all of those cases, the jails agreed to change their mail policies to allow prisoners to receive PLN and other correspondence.
- PLN has other censorship lawsuits pending against the Nevada DOC, the Florida DOC and jails in Texas, Tennessee, Virginia, Arizona, Michigan, Georgia and Florida.
- PLN settled a wrongful death suit brought by the family of a Washington state prisoner who died due to inadequate medical care, and settled a lawsuit filed on behalf of a former prisoner who lost her baby after guards at a CCA-run jail in Tennessee delayed sending her to a hospital.

With your help we can do more! Please send your donation to:

Prison Legal News, P.O. Box 1151, Lake Worth, FL 33460

Or call PLN's office at 561-360-2523 and use your credit card to donate.

Or visit PLN's website at www.prisonlegalnews.org and click on the "Donate" link.

PLN Support Gifts

Gift option 1

As a token of our gratitude for your support, we are providing the PLN card when making a donation of $50. The card is hand embroidered by women prisoners in Bolivia who are paid a fair wage for the cards to help support their families.

Gift option 2

In recognition of your support, we are providing the PLN hemp tote bag when making a donation of at least $75. Handmade in Vermont using hemp fiber. Carry books and groceries stylishly and help end the war on drugs!

Gift option 3

To show our appreciation for your support, we are providing the following selection of books for you to choose from when making a donation of $100. Donations of $100 or more can choose one free title. Each $100 donation entitles you to another free title; i.e., donate $500 and you get five books! $1,000 and you get everything on the page! Please circle the books you want and send the corresponding donation amount.

Gift option 4

As a thank you gift for your support, we are providing the entire PLN anthology of critically acclaimed books on mass imprisonment signed by editor Paul Wright! (The Celling of America, Prison Nation and Prison Profiteers) plus the PLN hemp tote bag to carry the books in when making a donation of $250 or more.

Florida: Sheriff's Office and Medical Provider Pay $1 Million for Prisoner's Death

by Gary Hunter

IN JULY 2013, ARMOR CORRECTIONAL Health Services agreed to settle a wrongful death suit by paying $800,000 to the family of Allen Daniel Hicks, Sr., who died after being denied medical care while incarcerated at a jail in Hillsborough County, Florida. The county paid another $200,000 to Hicks' family.

On the morning of May 11, 2012, Hicks was observed swerving down Interstate 275. Highway Patrolman Justin Lunsford and Sheriff's Deputy Richard Guzman found Hicks' car parked against a guardrail. They were joined at the scene by fire rescue personnel.

Hicks responded incoherently when asked for his driver's license. Once it became apparent he was too confused to find it, Guzman reached in and retrieved it from the car's console. When Hicks' left hand dropped to his side, the officers ordered him to show them his hands; when he did not immediately comply, they drew their service weapons. In his confused state, Hicks' only reaction was to respond, "That's a 9 millimeter semiautomatic gun that you have." After determining he was not armed, Hicks was dragged from his car.

He did not smell of alcohol. And even though he was unable to move his left arm, the paramedics who examined him at the scene "found no medical problems." But due to his erratic behavior they recommended that he be transported to a hospital for a psychological examination. The officers ignored the advice.

Instead, Hicks was taken to the Orient County Jail, where he did not receive an initial medical examination despite the fact that three nurses, employed by Armor, observed him when he was admitted. He was booked into the jail at 12:23 p.m.

Surveillance video showed that while being booked, Hicks' left side was completely immobilized – a classic symptom of a stroke. His mobility was so impaired that his left foot dragged on the floor beside his wheelchair and he was unable to sign his name. Instead of receiving an examination, Hicks was thrown into a jail cell where he lay facedown for hours. One of the nurses was overheard saying he was faking an illness.

Before his first medical examination at 3:35 p.m., video showed Hicks lying mostly motionless in his cell. Occasionally his right side would twitch or he would attempt to crawl using only his right side. At around 5:50 p.m., Hicks was transferred to the Falkenburg Road Jail.

It was not until 12:10 p.m. on May 12, more than a day after he was booked, that Hicks was given a psychiatric exam by a social worker. "The employee noted that [Hicks] could not engage, smelled of urine, and complained of incontinence, and indicated that he could not use his legs or walk ... he had decreased psychomotor activity [and was] delusional with a poor memory."

At about 10:30 p.m. an examining nurse finally concluded that Hicks may be suffering from a stroke. Over 36 hours from the time he was arrested, he was finally taken to a hospital. Physicians determined that Hicks had "...suffered a subacute ischemic stroke, which he had been suffering from for a considerable length of time ... he had suffered severe brain damage and it was too late to administer the appropriate treatment." He died three months later.

A statement issued by the Hillsborough County Sheriff's Office (HCSO) admitted "that mistakes were made" by jail staff and Armor employees. Although the Sheriff's Office "took immediate responsibility for its actions," Armor was not as forthcoming.

The company declined to comment regarding its role in Hicks' death. However, it defended its record in a written statement, saying, "Armor strives to deliver excellent patient care each and every day, no different than the finest teaching hospitals in our country.... And, like those outstanding hospitals, occasionally even great care results in an unintended outcome."

Yet the jail's surveillance video indicated that the level of care Hicks had received from Armor employees at the jail was woefully substandard. Thea Clark, an attorney for the Sheriff's Office, concluded, "There is no doubt in my mind that if plaintiff's claims were presented to a jury, plaintiff would receive a judgment against HCSO in amounts that far exceed $200,000."

As a result, the county – as well as Armor – decided to settle a wrongful death suit filed by Hicks' estate. See: Stalley v. FL Dept. of Highway Safety and Motor Vehicles, U.S.D.C. (M.D. Fla.), Case No. 8:13-cv-01892-VMC-TBM.

Shortly after Hicks' death, Col. James Previtera of the Hillsborough County Sheriff's Office revoked the security clearance of both Lewis Hays, the top-ranking Armor administrator at the jail, and his assistant for "improperly handling" Hicks' medical records. Previtera said the two employees had made "conflicting statements about the existence of records."

Armor transferred Hays to the Pinellas County Jail to serve as the company's administrator at that facility, but Sheriff Bob Gualtieri removed him and later canceled the county's contract with the company in May 2014, citing "operational concerns." Previously, Pinellas County had fined Armor over $150,000 for contractual violations.

"It just wasn't working," Sheriff Gualtieri stated. "I don't think we can work out some of those differences." He added: "The prudent thing to do is bring [medical care] back in-house."

Armor has been criticized for providing inadequate medical care on numerous occasions; thus, it was not surprising that effective October 1, 2014, Hillsborough County terminated its contract with the company, too. The county awarded a new $20 million contract to NaphCare, another for-profit prison and jail medical provider.

"It was time to test the market and see what was out there," said Hillsborough Sheriff's Col. Kenneth Davis, who oversees jail operations. "NaphCare just had a better model ... for the delivery of health care. They are quick to identify and treat the needs of inmates."

NaphCare provides medical services to several federal prisons in Florida, as well as a number of jails and state prisons across the country. The company, like Armor and most other for-profit correctional medical providers, also has a record of failing to provide adequate healthcare for prisoners. ■

Habeas Hints: Supreme Court Habeas Review 2014

by Kent Russell

This column provides “habeas hints” to prisoners who are considering or handling habeas corpus petitions as their own attorneys (“in pro per”). The focus of the column is on the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act (AEDPA), the federal habeas corpus law which now governs habeas corpus practice in courts throughout the United States.

How Far Right Has the Supreme Court Drifted on Habeas Corpus?

AS THE 2014 TERM PROCEEDS IN THE U.S. Supreme Court (SCOTUS), the Court’s docket contains very few habeas corpus cases – a situation similar to the 2013 term. This relatively quiet interlude comes in the wake of recent terms yielding blockbuster decisions which are major roadblocks to relief on federal habeas corpus – as described in my previous Habeas Hints columns, “Staring Down the Two-Headed Monster: Richter and Pinholster.” [See: PLN, Dec. 2013, p.28; Nov. 2013, p.12].

This provides an opportunity to step back and assess the degree to which the Court may have drifted so far to the “right” – that is, to the ultra-conservative “right-wing” extreme – that habeas corpus no longer serves a valuable function in holding the state criminal justice systems accountable by providing a federal check on unconstitutional convictions. Indeed, this is essentially the position that Michael Dorf, a law professor at Cornell, laid out in Verdict, an online publication, in a May 22, 2013 article titled “A Unanimous Supreme Court Ruling Underscores the Limits of Habeas Corpus as a Remedy for State Prisoners.”

Professor Dorf based this conclusion on Metrish v. Lancaster, 133 S.Ct. 1781 (2013), in which the Court unanimously held that a federal habeas corpus petitioner could not argue “diminished capacity” at his retrial even though Michigan law at the time he committed the crime specifically allowed for such a defense. In this column I’ll review Professor Dorf’s argument and explain why I disagree with it.

In Metrish, Burt Lancaster (not the famous actor but a former police officer with a long history of severe mental health problems) shot and killed his girlfriend in 1993. Lancaster was tried by jury in a Michigan court, where he admitted the killing but argued “diminished capacity” – a defense whereby a defendant who has been found to be legally sane nevertheless presents evidence of mental illness in an effort to negate the specific intent required for murder.

The jury didn’t buy the defense and convicted him of first-degree murder. Lancaster, however, filed a habeas corpus petition and managed to get his conviction reversed because the prosecutor had improperly excluded a potential juror on the basis of race.

Lancaster was retried but it was now 2005, and by that time the Michigan Supreme Court had rejected diminished capacity as a defense and the Michigan legislature had explicitly abolished diminished capacity, replacing it with a system in which the defendant could argue either that he was legally insane or “guilty but mentally ill,” but could no longer present evidence of mental illness in an effort to reduce the crime of murder to some lesser offense.

Lancaster was re-tried, and after electing a trial by judge rather than by jury, argued that the change in the law eliminating diminished capacity could not apply to him, because the Constitution prohibited the state from retroactively “punishing” a defendant by depriving him of a defense that had been in existence when the alleged crime occurred. However, the judge rejected that argument and prohibited Lancaster from using diminished capacity as a defense, whereupon he was again convicted of first-degree murder and sentenced to life in prison.

Lancaster then continued to assert his due process claim on appeal and habeas corpus. He was unsuccessful in the Michigan courts and in the U.S. District Court, but the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed, concluding that clearly established SCOTUS case law prohibited the state courts from retroactively depriving Lancaster of a diminished capacity defense. SCOTUS then granted certiorari, and a unanimous Court rejected Lancaster’s habeas claim and reinstated his conviction and sentence.

To anchor his argument that Metrish marks an extreme rightward tilt by SCOTUS, Professor Dorf adopts the premise that the justices unanimously rejected Lancaster’s habeas claim despite concluding that his trial “may very well have violated his due process rights.” In my judgment that’s just not so. Rather, the SCOTUS opinion carefully examined the prior cases relied upon by Lancaster, found them to be inapplicable and concluded: “The Court has never found a due process violation in circumstances remotely resembling Lancaster’s case.” That is far from a casual acknowledgment that Lancaster’s due process rights may have been violated; instead, it’s a clear and firm determination that his constitutional rights were not infringed.

Next, Professor Dorf argues that, because the Supreme Court – having previously held that a habeas petitioner cannot benefit from new rules announced since his conviction became final, yet refusing to allow Lancaster to assert a defense that was on the books when he was tried – has become a forum in which “The only operative rule is Heads I win, tails you lose.”

I don’t agree, at least not on the basis of Metrish. First, prohibiting Lancaster from arguing diminished capacity a second time doesn’t seem all that unfair, because Lancaster did have the opportunity to argue diminished capacity at his first trial and the jury rejected that defense. More importantly, the law that Lancaster was prohibited from using at his second trial was not only old but disfavored and disapproved – both in Michigan and in almost all other jurisdictions as well. Accordingly, nothing that the Court said in Metrish would prohibit some other petitioner from using old law to his benefit upon a retrial if the old law hadn’t been so discredited as to become legally obsolete.

Professor Dorf also relies on a brief historical analysis showing that SCOTUS has moved far to the right since the Warren Court era. That’s certainly true – a no-brainer, really – but I would argue that the major rightward tilt by SCOTUS had already reached its limit before its decision in Metrish. It’s no secret to anyone familiar with habeas history that, since the Warren Court’s heyday in the 1960s, SCOTUS has cut far back on the power of the federal courts to interfere with convictions and sentences handed down by the state courts.

Whereas a single federal judge used to have the power to set aside a criminal conviction simply because he or she disagreed with the state court's application of the underlying constitutional law, those days ended with the 1996 enactment of AEDPA – the law which prohibits a federal court from interfering with a state court's verdict or sentence unless the state court's decision was not only wrong, but “unreasonable.” Although SCOTUS backed away from eliminating habeas corpus altogether in the Guantanamo Bay cases, the Court has continued to weaken federal habeas corpus by requiring an almost slavish acceptance of state court denials, especially when it comes to IAC (ineffective assistance of counsel) claims – traditionally the backbone of habeas corpus litigation because it allows the petitioner to bring in new evidence not available at the time of trial.

Thus, well before SCOTUS decided Metrish in May 2013, there was already a consensus among the justices as to three core principles (let's call them the “Tough Three”) which, taken together, severely limit the role of federal habeas corpus as a bulwark against wrongful state convictions: 1) On federal habeas corpus, a prisoner bears the burden of disproving state factual findings by clear and convincing evidence and, as to the state court's legal reasoning, showing constitutional error “so lacking in justification that it is beyond any possibility for fairminded disagreement.” 2) The prisoner must carry this heavy burden solely on the basis of the state court record and without resort to a federal evidentiary hearing. 3) When a federal habeas petitioner's claim is based on IAC, the district court must accord “double deference” to the state court's denial of relief, such that the petitioner can only prevail if s/he can demonstrate that every conceivable basis for the state court's denial – whether actually mentioned by the state court or not – is unreasonable.

Compared with the Tough Three, which had already impacted the vast majority of the thousands of federal habeas corpus petitions filed annually, Metrish involved a unique situation involving all of the following anomalies: a defense that was on the books when the defendant was tried but which was abolished just a few years later; a defendant who was allowed to use the since-abolished defense at the first trial and did so, but who lost because the jury rejected it; a habeas petitioner who managed to win a retrial on federal habeas corpus but on an issue having nothing whatsoever to do with the disapproved defense; and a retrial which occurred after the former defense was not only abolished by the state's highest court but also was explicitly removed by the state legislature as part of a comprehensive overhaul of the state's criminal code.

Thus, Metrish was a perfect storm of highly unusual occurrences that almost certainly will never happen again in any other case coming before the Supreme Court. Accordingly, that this bizarre case was decided unanimously does not represent to me a consensus on anything other than that it wasn't worth it to labor over a dissenting or concurring opinion in a case of such insignificance to habeas corpus litigation as a whole.

In the concluding part of his article, Professor Dorf offers three specific reasons why he believes the ground has shifted to the right in the Supreme Court. But none supports his thesis that SCOTUS has drifted so far right that federal habeas corpus no longer serves as a check on wrongful state convictions.

First, he argues that no politicians – Democrats or Republicans – have any “political angle” in supporting the constitutional rights of criminal defendants. That may have been true when AEDPA was enacted in 1996, but since then there have been hundreds of cases of people who were duly convicted in state courts but who have since been proved to be completely innocent, many after serving lengthy prison terms.

The public is well aware of these exonerations through news reports, documentaries and even plays and movies, and I would argue that, as a result, many if not most voters would enthusiastically support a politician who opposes a legal system in which federal habeas corpus – the last bastion of the wrongfully convicted – is eliminated as a remedy.

Second, Dorf laments that even Justice Ginsburg – the Court's most liberal voice – quietly accepted Lancaster's “unconstitutional conviction.” Yet, as I've shown above, there was nothing unfair or unconstitutional about Lancaster's failure to get a second bite at a rotten apple, and Justice Ginsburg continues to dissent in habeas cases which, unlike Metrish, affect numerous defendants. (See, e.g., White v. Woodall, 134 S.Ct. 1697 (2014) (Ginsburg, j., dissenting with Breyer and Sotomayor in a habeas case involving penalty-phase jury instructions)).

Third, Dorf “speculates” that the justices, having stood fast against the Bush administration’s pressure to abandon habeas corpus altogether in the Guantanamo cases, have incurred a species of battle fatigue whereby they “have less energy or inclination to fight for habeas corpus as a mechanism for collateral review of state convictions.” But if that’s true, then the liberal justices would have stopped dissenting across the board in criminal and habeas cases, and that simply hasn’t happened. Moreover, it’s even possible that Justice Roberts is beginning to emerge as an advocate for civil liberties and constitutional rights. (See, e.g., Roberts’ majority opinion invalidating a police seizure of a defendant’s cell phone in Riley v. California, 134 S.Ct. 2473 (2014), and his strong dissent from a ruling in which the majority upheld a criminal forfeiture case which resulted in the defendant being denied the right to counsel to contest the forfeiture, in Kaley v. United States, 134 S.Ct. 1090 (2014)).

In sum, the Court has surely moved to the right in the past few decades, but most of that happened well before the decision in Metrish v. Lancaster. And, contrary to Professor Dorf, I believe that SCOTUS is more likely now to continue to defend habeas corpus in the most important cases than to go off the right-wing cliff and abandon the Great Writ altogether as a check on unconstitutional state convictions. ■

Inspection Finds Improvements at CCA-Owned Ohio Facility Following Rocky Start

A SEPTEMBER 2013 RE-INSPECTION report cited improvements in conditions at a privately-owned prison near Cleveland, Ohio compared to an inspection performed a year earlier, when state auditors identified numerous areas of non-compliance with state standards and conditions so bad that prisoners were living in mold-infested housing units without running water or working toilets.

Inspectors with the Correctional Institution Inspection Committee (CIIC), Ohio’s independent prison watchdog agency, said not all of the problems previously identified had been fixed at the 1,800-bed Lake Erie Correctional Institution (LECI), operated by Corrections Corporation of America (CCA) – but their September 2013 report indicated the prison was “heading in a positive direction.”

CCA had purchased LECI from the state in 2011 for $72.7 million, and Ohio pays the company an annual fee and per diem rate to house prisoners at the facility under a 20-year contract with a guaranteed 90% occupancy. [See: PLN, Nov. 2012, p.16].

“The CIIC inspection team’s overall sense is that conditions have improved,” the report stated. “CCA has poured significant resources into the prison, including removing or changing staff, hiring on former (Ohio Department of Rehabilitation and Correction) staff, investing in additional security measures, and bringing in outside consultants.”

Despite those remedial actions, the CIIC team found that some areas showed little or no improvement over conditions cited during a January 2013 inspection. Specifically, “primary concerns” at the prison included “safety, security, and inmate discipline.”

For example, CIIC auditors found that incidents of prisoner-on-prisoner and prisoner-on-staff violence continued at a pace to match 2012’s record increase in the number of assaults at LECI. Following the January report, which noted a 180% increase in prisoner-on-prisoner violence and 300% increase in prisoner-on-staff assaults, CCA replaced the warden at the facility.

The re-inspection, conducted on September 9 and 10, 2013, was published the following month. Unlike the January 2013 audit when CIIC conducted a surprise inspection, the prison had advance notice of the September review.

The latest inspection report also found some areas in which conditions at the prison had worsened, including a “significantly higher percentage” of prisoners who tested positive for illegal substances during the first eight months of 2013 compared to the same period a year earlier.

“Heroin was like it was legal in there,” said a former LECI prisoner who was released in September 2013. “I wouldn’t have had to get out of bed to get heroin. I could have had it delivered to my bunk, there was so much.”

Inspectors also voiced concern over disciplinary actions and use of force by CCA staff, as well as levels of serious misconduct greater than those at similar minimum- and medium-security Ohio state prisons. The number of grievances filed by prisoners remained higher than during the years before CCA assumed control of LECI, although the number was down slightly compared to the January 2013 report, which had also cited “a high presence of gang activity and illegal substance use” and “frequent extortion and theft.”

The inspectors reported they had received various complaints from prisoners about medical and recreational services at the facility, though the audit did not specifically address those areas. They also noted that most of the CCA guards who were interviewed reported low or very low morale due to low wages.

Violations discovered in an earlier September 2012 audit of LECI included non-compliance with health, safety and administrative standards – ranging from poor food quality and sanitation to inadequate medical staffing, neglect of segregated prisoners, emergency unpreparedness and unsafe storage of hazardous materials.

Critics said the results of that audit indicted that CCA was “woefully unfit for the job” when it bought LECI from the state and began operating the facility on January 1, 2012. The company had touted the purchase as a model for other states wanting to reduce their corrections budgets and raise cash through the sale of prisons, but problems arose almost immediately.

The ACLU of Ohio reported that the September 2012 audit found “outrageous violations” at the CCA facility. In a blog post, Ohio ACLU senior policy director Mike Brickner described incidents such as “prisoners being forced to use plastic bags for defecation and cups for urination because they had no running water for toilets. Basic conditions were heinous, with black mold, standing water, and spoiled food found throughout the prison.”

Within two months CCA had corrected many of those deficiencies, such as cleaning the black mold and replacing broken water fixtures, Brickner wrote, but he noted that “major problems like severe overcrowding, expanded use of solitary confinement, and inadequate medical care were simply left as ‘pending’ – a polite governmental term for ‘not done.’”

Another issue was the smuggling of contraband into the prison, especially drugs, alcohol and cell phones. The problem grew so serious, the ACLU said, that police started night patrols at the facility to catch people throwing contraband over the perimeter fence.

Local police assumed jurisdiction over LECI from the state highway patrol following the CCA takeover because Ohio law prohibits the highway patrol from policing privately-owned facilities.

Among the more egregious violations cited in the September 2012 inspection report were conditions in LECI’s segregation unit. The report found that CCA had failed to ensure adequate medical care for segregated prisoners or provide proper oversight of the disciplinary system. CCA was also in violation of Department of Rehabilitation and Correction (DRC) policy by triple-bunking prisoners in segregation units, and guards failed to provide those prisoners with at least one hour of daily exercise or sufficient laundry and bedding.

Less than two months later, according to a November 2012 re-inspection, most of those issues had been corrected.

“The conditions of confinement within the segregation area were vastly improved,” the November report said. “It is anticipated [triple-bunked cells] will be eliminated in the very near future as collaborative transfer efforts between LECI staff and the DRC Bureau of Classification staff action continues until completed.”

The September 2012 report had also noted that administrative staff at LECI, including the warden, assistant warden and department heads, did not visit the prison’s living and recreation areas on a weekly basis to communicate with prisoners and observe conditions, as required by DRC policy. The November re-inspection, however, found that administrators had started conducting regular rounds.

The increase in compliance was apparently evident to prisoners, who, according to the re-inspection report, “were complimenting the change in atmosphere and ... felt better about how the process was going.”

While LECI’s medical facilities “did appear to be calm and [were] better organized and staff was knowledgeable of DRC policies,” the November 2012 report still found that “staffing levels are not where they should be” and recommended that “vacancies be filled as soon as possible to ensure staff has the resources needed to complete the required tasks.”

LECI was accredited by the American Correctional Association (ACA) following a December 2012 audit, in spite of the deficiencies cited in the various CIIC inspection reports. ■

Norris Henderson: A Profile of Commitment to Criminal Justice Reform

by Gary Hunter

IN 1977, NORRIS HENDERSON ARRIVED at the Louisiana State Penitentiary in Angola, more commonly known, then and now, as just Angola. With the weight of a life sentence on his shoulders, he had to confront the prison's legendary legacy of violence.

In 1930 it was estimated that one in every ten prisoners at Angola had been stabbed. In 1952, 31 prisoners known as the Heel String Gang severed their own Achilles' tendons to protest deplorable conditions at the facility. The last member of the group died in 2010, still locked away in Angola. Two prisoners were shot in 1999, one fatally, during a failed escape attempt in which a guard was killed.

But amid this violent history, during Norris Henderson's 27-year tenure at Angola other historic events were taking place – with Norris squarely at the center.

In 1987, violence was erupting in prisons across the country, including riots at federal facilities in Atlanta, Georgia and Oakdale, Louisiana. Guards were on edge as rebellious prisoners at Angola conspired to show the world once again how the facility got its violent reputation. Norris had a different idea. Using his position as a clerk in the law library, he persuaded some of the more educated, open-minded prisoners to try a progressive, political problem-solving approach.

"The idea was to initiate legislation that would provide some relief and hope of parole for men with life sentences," Norris told PLN during a September 2014 interview.

Angola has the highest number of lifers in the United States; as of June 30, 2014, 84.3% of the approximately 6,300 prisoners at Angola were serving life sentences.

Norris' idea caught on. Weeks turned into months as the legal team pushed its paperwork past state politicians. Their idea gained traction as lawmakers saw its potential, and relief seemed closer than ever. Then, in an ironic twist, the legislature passed a bill that granted relief to every prisoner except those with life sentences.

Norris was disappointed, but a victory is a victory and in the eyes of his peers Norris' team had won. And so in 1987, the Angola Special Civics Project was founded.

Norris was just getting started, however. For the next 16 years he used his legal acumen to help his fellow prisoners secure their rights. Respect for his intellect and integrity grew among both prisoners and prison staff.

In the mid-1990s, Henderson led a month-long boycott of the prison's phone service provider, Global Tel*Link. The protest sparked an investigation by Kathleen Blanco, chairperson of the Louisiana Public Service Commission at the time. She forced Global Tel to refund over $1 million the company had gouged from the pockets of prisoners' families.

One prisoner, released with Henderson's help, returned the favor by contacting attorney Laurie White, who ended up working with Norris until his release in 2003. When he finally walked out of prison, he had already laid the groundwork for his life's mission. He knew exactly what he had to do.

Norris told PLN, "Most people who've been incarcerated didn't know what their voting rights are. Some thought it was 10 years after they got out, some thought you had to have a pardon, others thought they had lost the right to vote completely. Most candidates don't even see prisoners and their families as a constituency."

And so, just as he did while incarcerated, Norris began educating ex-prisoners on how to secure their legal rights through the political process. One year to the date of his release, Voice of the Ex-Offender (VOTE), an advocacy organization with Norris as executive director, was born.

VOTE rallied families around Kathleen Blanco's 2004 gubernatorial campaign, and she won the election handily. The organization has managed to fight jail overcrowding by having caps placed on prison beds, and to initiate criminal justice reform to curb police brutality. And in a stroke of poetic justice, Norris was able to help the attorney who had represented him during his last years in Angola.

Behind by 3,000 votes in a primary election, Laurie White, who was running for judge, was struggling in her bid for the bench. VOTE mobilized its forces behind her campaign and she eventually won by 10,000 votes.

Norris Henderson was honored as Trailblazer of the Year in 2014 by the New Orleans Data News Weekly. He is the recipient of the American Civil Liberties Union's Ben Smith Award, received the Society of American Law Teachers' Human Rights Award and was honored by the City of New Orleans with Norris Henderson Day. He is a former Soros Justice Fellow.

When asked about his success, Norris invariably points to others who have influenced him. He says he was inspired by Ray Hill, an ex-con from Texas who went on to successfully establish his own prison radio talk show. [See: PLN, Nov. 2009, p.10]. Norris also credits Prison Legal News for keeping him on the cutting edge of legal trends and court decisions.

"In 1993, I was PLN's first subscriber in Louisiana. I would use it to show guys in the law library what the courts were doing in other states. I would use PLN to help me push the envelope in our behalf," he said.

It is impossible to fathom the amount of pressure that nearly three decades in prison puts on a person. Most men are glad just to survive. But a few actually thrive despite their carceral circumstances, and Norris is living proof.

"You erase the years by raising the rights of the incarcerated," he stated. "Prison can be a bad experience with good results. You have to find your niche. You have to be committed."

States Renewing Their Prison Phone Contracts

As state DOCs renew or rebid their prison phone contracts, you can help urge them to lower intrastate phone rates and eliminate commission kickbacks!

The Campaign for Prison Phone Justice needs your help in:

**** North Dakota, Oklahoma, Washington ******

The Departments of Corrections in the above states are in the process of re-bidding or renewing their prison phone contracts. Most DOCs receive a commission (kickback) on revenue generated from calls made by prisoners, which results in excessively high phone rates. Although the FCC voted last year to cap the costs of interstate (long distance) prison calls, which went into effect on February 11, 2014, the order does not apply to intrastate (in-state) calls. An estimated 85% of prison phone calls are in-state. This is an opportunity to ask DOCs to forgo commissions and ensure their new prison phone contracts are based on the lowest cost to those who pay for the calls – mostly prisoners' families.

Take Action NOW! Here's What YOU Can Do!

Ask your family members and friends to write, email, call and fax the DOC and the governor's office (addresses and contacts are listed below), requesting that the DOC: 1) forgo commission payments when re-bidding or renewing its prison phone contract, and 2) base the new contract on the lowest calling costs. Lower prison phone rates should apply not just to long distance calls but also to in-state calls. For a sample letter or to easily send an email, visit the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice's website and click on the "Take Action" tab:

The Double-Edged Sword of Video Visitation: Claiming to Keep Families Together while Furthering the Aims of the Prison Industrial Complex

by Prof. Patrice A. Fulcher

AT FIRST GLANCE, JAIL/PRISON VIDEO visitation schemes may seem beneficial to incarcerated persons and their families, as well as correctional departments. Jail/prison video visitation systems claim to afford greater opportunities to stay connected with loved ones, help to alleviate correctional safety concerns and generate institutional revenues, which offset incarceration costs. Thus the implementation of video visitation in U.S. prisons and jails appears to be a viable, mutually beneficial solution to correctional visitation concerns.

However, by scratching the surface, the double-edged sword of video visitation is revealed. The reality of video visitation presents several issues: 1) the elimination of face-to-face visits removes essential human contact that is critical to the survival of incarcerated individuals; 2) almost all of the in-home video visitation services charge excessive fees, which in turn exploit family and friends of incarcerated individuals; and 3) the economic success of video visitation is contingent upon the number of incarcerated individuals – a decrease in prison population has a direct effect on revenue and profits, and therefore further incentivizes incarceration.

Video visitation has the potential to keep families connected, yet the elimination of face-to-face visits threatens to erode much-needed associations an incarcerated person has with their loved ones and community. For those incarcerated, sustaining a connection to the world outside jail/prison walls is vital to successful service of jail/prison sentences and re-entry into society upon release. Many correctional institutions lack sufficient bed space or ample facilities, so incarcerated persons are routinely sent to other institutions to serve their sentences. These other institutions are typically in rural areas, far from the sentenced person's community, so the extreme distance often prevents families and friends from making consistent visits.

In 2004, 62% of parents in state correctional facilities were incarcerated 100 miles or more away from their children and communities, consequently 58% of these incarcerated persons never received a visit. In the same year in federal facilities, 84% of parents were incarcerated 100 miles or more away from their children and communities, and 44% never received a visit.

Jeffery Leving, a proponent of jail/prison video visitation, argues that it will help to reduce the negative effects on children who grow up with incarcerated fathers. Leving further states that children should be in safe, comfortable environments while visiting their parents, as opposed to unfavorable prison environments that may be traumatic to children. It may be true that a majority of jail/prison settings are distasteful (although correctional institutions should make every effort to create welcoming visitation areas), and that video visitation might help to alleviate Leving's concerns, but a greater problem arises when video visitation is used to completely eradicate face-to-face visits.

The Corinne Wolfe Children's Law Center purports that the most effective way of preserving the well-being of children of incarcerated parents is to allow contact visitation between the parents and children. The Center claims that the ability of children and parents to physically touch each other is instrumental to successful bonding; this also helps normalize the situation and interactions between the parent and child, while benefiting the children emotionally and behaviorally. Thus jail/prison video visitation should be a supplement, not a replacement, for correctional face-to-face and contact visitation.

Moreover, there is widespread concern for the elimination of face-to-face and contact visits. Some U.S. correctional facilities have already completely eliminated all visits aside from video visitation. At the Washington, D.C. jail, the complete elimination of face-to-face and contact visits has caused public uproar and a push by the District of Columbia Bar Association, the Washington Post editorial board and members of the D.C. Council to restore in-person visitation through the implementation of the Video Visitation Modification Act. These groups contend that video visitation is impersonal and undermines rehabilitative efforts.

Video visitation is also problematic due to excessive fees associated with its usage. In most cases, the implementation of video visitation within correctional facilities does not create an additional expense for families and friends of incarcerated individuals. The issue lies with online video visitation costs, which run the risk of being exploitive. Correctional facilities have complete discretion in implementing rates and fees for online visits; as a result, jail/prison online video visitation fees are completely unregulated.

The unregulated nature of jail/prison video visitation has led to varying costs for the service, which are largely determined by the facilities. The Pennsylvania Department of Corrections charges families $20 for a 55-minute visit, and the Virginia Department of Corrections charges $15 for a 30-minute visit and $30 for a 60-minute visit, whereas the Desoto County Jail in Hernando, Mississippi charges families $20 for a 20-minute visit. If these fees continue to be unregulated, they will lead to the continued economic exploitation of family and friends of incarcerated persons.

For example, for the past twenty years, jail/prison telephone call fees were also unregulated. In August 2013, the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) found that such fees were exorbitant and voted to cap the cost of interstate jail/prison calls. Prior to the FCC's regulation, people were paying as much as $17.30 for a 15-minute phone call to speak with incarcerated family and friends. Martha Wright, for instance, who filed a petition that led to the FCC's action, was forced to choose paying high telephone rates to speak with her incarcerated grandson on Sundays instead of paying for her prescribed medications.

Without regulation of prison/jail video visitation fees, companies such as Securus, GTL, Renovo and VuGate stand to enjoy substantial corporate financial gains, which have shown to be millions of dollars. Correctional institutions are also generating funds from online video visitation. In Ada County, Idaho, the Sheriff claimed that virtual visits would generate $2,000,000 over the course of two years. In Portsmouth, Virginia, the city contracted with a video visitation company called HomeWav. As a result of this contractual agreement, HomeWav grosses about $1,400 a month and the Portsmouth Sheriff's Department receives about $1,000 a month.

Moreover, the excessive fees and high financial gains associated with the use of jail/prison video visitation lead to incentivizing incarceration. The Prison Industrial Complex (PIC) is a multi-billion dollar profiteering industry rooted in the economic exploitation and dehumanization of extremely high numbers of human beings in U.S. jails and prisons. The PIC is one of the fastest-growing industries in the United States and generates revenues based on the mass incarceration of human beings.

The exclusive use of jail/prison video visitation systems has the potential to be another profiteering scheme of the PIC. Employing unregulated video visitation systems in jails and prisons will continue the frightful trend of incentivizing mass incarceration in the United States because this form of visitation offers vast economic opportunities for private companies and correctional institutions.

Ultimately, jail/prison video visitation is a double-edged sword as currently implemented because it cultivates the value of monetary gain over the lives of incarcerated persons and their loved ones. The current trend of jail/prison video visitation will continue to dissolve community bonds and lead to unrelenting economic subjugation of incarcerated persons and their families if in-person visits are replaced with dehumanizing video visitation screens.

On the other hand, the use of jail/prison video visitation might advance altruistic as well as institutional goals if highly regulated and used in conjunction with, not in lieu of, face-to-face and contact visits; such visitation systems must not be emotionally and financially repressive. Accordingly, jail/prison video visitation should only be implemented as a means to strengthen family and community ties and promote successful re-entry, and if there are any associated fees they must be affordable and transparent. ■

Missouri DOC Must Provide Notice of Censorship

A FEDERAL DISTRICT COURT IN MISSOURI has approved a settlement agreement that requires Missouri Department of Corrections (MODOC) officials to provide notice when books and publications sent to state prisoners are censored and withheld.

The settlement resolves a class-action suit filed by Bobbie Y. Lane, owner of a publishing company called Caged Potential. In November 2010 and January 2011, the company mailed nine copies of a book titled So Far From Paradise to prisoners at the Crossroads Correctional Center. The book was written by Lane's cousin, Sultan K. Lane, who was incarcerated at the facility – a maximum-security lock-up in Cameron, Missouri.

The books were withheld under the MODOC's censorship policy, which did not require that publishers or other senders receive notice when publications were rejected. Alleging that the policy violated the company's right to due process under the 14th Amendment, Caged Potential sought an injunction requiring the MODOC to notify senders when publications are censored and grant them the right to appeal.

U.S. District Court Judge Nanette Laughrey entered a preliminary injunction on November 15, 2012, requiring the MODOC to provide notice and an opportunity for senders of censored publications to be heard. She also certified a class in the case composed of "all current and future publishers, distributors, and authors of written materials, who mail books, publications, or other written materials to inmates incarcerated in prisons operated by MODOC."

"There is no question that publishers who wish to communicate with those who, through subscription, willingly seek their view have a legitimate First Amendment interest in access to prisoners" and that "both inmates and publishers have a right to procedural due process when publications are rejected," Laughrey wrote. The court also held that requiring the MODOC to provide notice of censorship would not impose a burden on the defendants.

The parties then entered into settlement negotiations and formulated a draft plan, under which the "Defendants agree to notify the offenders within its correctional facilities that senders of censored publications, personal correspondence, and pictures will receive notice of censorship decisions." The parties agreed to the settlement in January 2013.

Prison Legal News (PLN), which was not a named party in the case but would be affected by the terms of the settlement as a class member, petitioned the court to reject the agreement, contending that the proposed settlement was insufficient.

In its June 26, 2014 objection, PLN argued that the settlement agreement should not be approved because "it does not require that publishers and other senders be given notice of the censorship of their mail at the time that the censorship occurs, instead, there is an inordinate delay in between the act of censorship and the provision of due process notice to the sender."

Additionally, "While the agreement does require notice, it contains no time limit for the provision of such notice nor does it contain a requirement that senders be given an adequate explanation of the reason for censorship."

The ability of members of the class-action suit to enforce the settlement would be restricted, because "The agreement further prohibits fees and costs for monitoring defendants' compliance and it unfairly restricts the forum for bringing any enforcement action to the Circuit Court of Cole County, Missouri," PLN wrote. "These restrictions make the prospect of monitoring compliance prohibitively expensive and would create unfair logistical hurdles for an aggrieved sender, rendering the settlement agreement effectively unenforceable."

The district court held a settlement approval hearing on July 1, 2014, acknowledging PLN's objections and ordering the defendants to post notice of the settlement agreement in the law libraries of all Missouri state prisons. Class members had 30 days to file objections to the settlement.

On September 5, 2014, the court held a second hearing and instructed the parties to submit a proposed order approving the settlement agreement. The settlement was approved by the district court and went into effect October 22, 2014.

The plaintiff class members are represented by the ACLU of Eastern Missouri and ACLU of Kansas and Western Missouri; PLN's objections were filed by Lance Weber, general counsel of the Human Rights Defense Center, PLN's parent organization. See: Lane v. Lombardi, U.S.D.C. (W.D. Mo.), Case No. 2:12-cv-04219-NKL.

PLN will report future developments in this case. ■

Former Kansas Attorney General has Law License Suspended Indefinitely

by Christopher Zoukis

ON OCTOBER 18, 2013, THE KANSAS Supreme Court indefinitely suspended the law license of former State Attorney General Phillip D. "Phill" Kline, who became nationally known for his repeated prosecutions of Planned Parenthood and Dr. George Tiller, an abortion provider later murdered by an anti-abortion activist.

In a 154-page decision that detailed Kline's violations of the Kansas Rules of Professional Conduct, the unanimous state Supreme Court held there was "clear and convincing evidence" that he had demonstrated "overzealous advocacy" and failed to operate "within the bounds of the law." The Court concluded he had "violated his duties to the public, the legal system, and the legal profession."

Kline, who served as Attorney General from 2003 to 2007, is now an assistant law professor at Liberty University in Virginia – a Christian-oriented school founded by evangelist pastor Jerry Falwell. He will be able to apply for reinstatement of his law license every three years.

The Supreme Court found Kline had engaged in misconduct when he had staffers attach sealed records to a public brief in violation of a court order, then ordered them to provide "misleading" information about their actions in an ensuing investigation.

He was also found to have repeatedly lied about how he obtained confidential patient records from Planned Parenthood while he was a district attorney. As a prosecutor, Kline filed at least 107 criminal charges against Planned Parenthood, charging the organization with performing illegal abortions and altering records. All of the charges were ultimately dropped, as were charges filed against various doctors associated with the clinic.

Kline became well known in connection with his aggressive prosecutions of Dr. George Tiller after being elected Attorney General. He appeared on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor during a 2006 "Tiller the Baby Killer" campaign – an appearance that the Kansas Supreme Court found did not constitute misconduct. Dr. Tiller was murdered by anti-abortion activist Scott Roeder in May 2009.

Kline's attorney said the disciplinary board, which had recommended disbarment, "cherry-picked" incidents from Kline's past to paint a "false picture" of his conduct. While the Court did not make the suspension permanent, it wrote that "Kline's inability or refusal to acknowledge or address [the misconduct's] significance is particularly troubling in light of his service as the chief prosecuting attorney for this State and its most populous county."

While in office, Kline served as the Chairman of the Republican Attorneys' General Association and Co-Chair of the National Violent Sexual Predator Apprehension Task Force, and was an executive committee member of the National Association of Attorneys General.

Kline appealed his indefinite suspension to the U.S. Supreme Court, which denied his petition for writ of certiorari in April 2014. Ironically, Kline had previously argued before the Supreme Court himself, in a 2006 death penalty case. See: In re Kline, 298 Kan. 96, 311 P.3d 321 (Kan. 2013), cert. denied. ■

Alaska Supreme Court Suspends Former Deputy Attorney General

by Christopher Zoukis

FORMER ALASKA DEPUTY ATTORNEY General and prosecutor Patrick Gullufsen, 66, was suspended from the practice of law for 18 months in July 2013 after a Superior Court found he had “blatantly lied” about forensic analysis of DNA evidence during the 2010 trial of Jimmy Eacker, who was found guilty of murder.

Eacker’s conviction was tossed out in early 2011 when Superior Court Judge Anna Moran determined that Gullufsen’s conduct amounted to a “flagrant, regardless or negligent disregard of the State’s obligation under the Alaska Constitution.”

Eacker later pleaded guilty to a lesser charge of manslaughter and was sentenced to 20 years in prison.

According to court records, Eacker was identified as the chief suspect by a “cold case” squad investigating a 1982 murder. While he was a key suspect in the 1980s, it was not until 2006 that an evidence custodian came across DNA evidence from the case and had it tested. Gullufsen used the DNA evidence to suggest to the jury that blood and semen at the crime scene proved Eacker’s guilt.

However, he failed to tell the jury—or the defense—that a state expert said the evidence was not reliable due to its age and how it was stored; that it had been contaminated by a technician’s own DNA; and, perhaps most importantly, that the DNA profile did not match Eacker’s. Gullufsen had stonewalled Eacker’s defense attorney who requested information about the DNA test by claiming it had not been completed prior to trial.

Gullufsen retired from the Alaska Department of Law in 2010, and that agency is assessing whether “additional corrective steps are warranted,” such as a review of other cases involving the former prosecutor, who admitted to “misleading the court” in the Eacker murder trial.

Since Gullufsen had already retired, the suspension will have little effect. ■

Philadelphia Prosecutor Busted for Filing False Police Report Against Ex-Boyfriend

by Christopher Zoukis

ASSISTANT DISTRICT ATTORNEY LYNN M. Nichols, 47, assigned to the homicide unit in Philadelphia, was arrested on October 4, 2013 for filing a false police report as part of a scheme to seek revenge against an ex-boyfriend.

Nichols, a 22-year veteran of the District Attorney’s office, resigned following her suspension for ethical violations related to the scheme.

Her troubles involved a pickup truck driven by her ex-boyfriend that was owned by another woman, who had reported it stolen. In October 2012, to protect her boyfriend, Nichols convinced a Philadelphia police officer to remove the truck from the National Crime Information Center’s database of stolen vehicles.

A year later, months after breaking up with her boyfriend, Nichols went to the home of the truck’s owner and told her she knew where it had been stored for the last year. The two conspired to get revenge against Nichols’ ex. Nichols called 911 from the woman’s home phone, pretended to be the woman’s sister and filed a false police report claiming the vehicle had been stolen that day.

When the officers who took the report left, Nichols called a police department in New Jersey and said she had information that the “stolen” truck might be at a specific address. Officers located the pickup and determined it had not been stolen that day due to its condition. When they contacted the woman who owned the vehicle, she quickly confessed and admitted Nichols had put her up to the scheme.

Philadelphia District Attorney Seth Williams released a statement praising Nichols for her “long and successful career,” but said “[w]e must maintain the highest standards of conduct in [the District Attorney’s] office, and the legal process must take its course.”

Nichols pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor charge of criminal mischief. She was sentenced on July 18, 2014 to one year of probation and $884 in restitution; charges of false reporting and obstruction of justice were dropped as part of the plea deal. She also has been suspended from practicing law by the Pennsylvania Supreme Court. ■

Prosecutorial Misconduct Results in New Trial in Connecticut Murder Case

by Christopher Zoukis

IN A RARE PUBLIC REBUKE OF A PROSECUTOR found to have engaged in a “deliberate pattern of misconduct,” the Connecticut Appellate Court vacated a defendant’s murder conviction based on the prosecutor’s improper remarks during closing arguments.

Senior Assistant State’s Attorney Terence D. Mariani, Jr. was chided in an opinion by Judge Michael R. Sheldon, writing for a three-judge panel in the direct appeal of Victor Santiago, who was found guilty of killing a Waterbury bar owner during a 1998 robbery. Santiago was not arrested in the case until 2010, when his estranged wife implicated him and his two brothers in the murder.

In ordering a new trial for Santiago, who had received a life sentence, the Appellate Court held that Mariani deliberately “flouted” a trial court’s ruling that limited references to Santiago’s alleged involvement in the Latin Kings gang to establish a basis for Santiago’s wife’s fear of him. The court noted that Mariani repeatedly referred to Santiago’s connection with the Latin Kings during his closing arguments.

Santiago’s lawyer had complained that Mariani called her client a “gang banger” and made other references to the Latin Kings to attack Santiago’s character and intimate to the jury that he was a dangerous person. Mariani even made “inexplicable” degrading comments about Santiago’s wife and children before the jury, prompting the court to write that his remarks were “not only improper in a legal sense, but they were also rude and irrelevant to any of the issues in the case.”

More pointedly, the Appellate Court held in its May 28, 2013 decision that Mariani “had engaged in a deliberate pattern of improper conduct in this case and others.” The court took the unusual step of cataloging incidents in at least a half-dozen other published cases in which the prosecutor had made improper comments, dating back more than a decade. For example, in a 2001 case Mariani had argued to the jury, “If I loaded that gun and shut out the lights in this courtroom and put it in [the defendant’s] hand, I think everyone would [see] how dangerous he is.”

In vacating Santiago’s murder conviction, the Appellate Court said it recognized that represented an extraordinary remedy, but that Mariani “remains undeterred by pronouncements of this court and our Supreme Court that his conduct was improper,” and “nothing short of reversal will have the effect of deterring him” from further misconduct. See: State v. Santiago, 143 Conn. App. 26, 66 A.3d 520 (Conn. 2013).

Mariani remains employed with the State’s Attorney’s office in Waterbury, Connecticut.

Missouri Prisoner Exonerated in 1983 Prison Murder; Brady Violations Cited

by Christopher Zoukis

REGINALD “REGGIE” GRIFFIN, 53, was sentenced to death for the July 12, 1983 stabbing of James Bausley in a yard at the Moberly Correctional Center (then known as the Missouri Training Center for Men). In August 2011, the Missouri Supreme Court vacated Griffin’s conviction after finding the state had withheld evidence related to another prisoner who was likely involved in the murder.

That prisoner, Jeffrey Smith, was found with a sharpened screwdriver while attempting to leave the yard shortly after Bausley was killed; Smith was convicted of unlawful use of a weapon. The state Supreme Court found the prosecution had violated its Brady obligations by failing to disclose that information to Griffin, which would have bolstered his “alternate perpetrator” defense at trial. See: State ex rel. Griffin v. Denney, 347 S.W.3d 73 (Mo. 2011), cert. denied.

The 2011 vacatur of Griffin’s conviction was not the first time the Missouri Supreme Court had ruled in the case; it had previously vacated Griffin’s death sentence after finding the state wrongly relied on the criminal record of another prisoner with the same name as Griffin during the penalty phase of the trial. Griffin then received a life sentence and was removed from death row.

Another prisoner, Doyle Franks, was also convicted in connection with Bausley’s death; he admitted that he had killed Bausley and Griffin was not involved. A second co-defendant acquitted at trial had likewise denied that Griffin was involved.

In 2006, Paul Curtis, a prisoner who testified that he saw Griffin kill Bausley, admitted to state investigators that his testimony was false. He did not see Griffin commit the stabbing, but lied at trial in exchange for benefits such as a transfer to another prison, money and a TV set.

Remarkably, state prosecutors made no mention of Curtis’ recantation during Griffin’s habeas corpus proceedings in 2011. When questioned about that non-disclosure at a November 2012 hearing, Assistant Attorney General Stephen Hawke told a judge that since the habeas proceedings were of a civil nature rather than criminal, the rules requiring pre-trial disclosure of exculpatory evidence did not apply. He said the state was “under no obligation to disclose” the evidence.

Although the state initially indicated it would retry Griffin for Bausley’s murder, the charges were dropped in October 2013 after prosecutors indicated they did not have sufficient evidence to convict him. Griffin had previously been released from prison on bond pending the state’s decision to retry him.

“Thirty years of life – essentially stolen by shoddy investigation and prosecution – cannot be returned to Reggie,” said Rita Linhardt with Missourians for Alternatives to the Death Penalty. “Restitution is in order. At least he is alive and finally truly free.”

Florida Prosecutor Suspended for Ex Parte Contact with Judge During Murder Trial

by Christopher Zoukis

A FLORIDA PROSECUTOR WHO ENGAGED in text messages, cell phone calls and dinner dates with the judge presiding over a capital murder trial has been suspended for two years by the Florida Supreme Court. The judge who engaged in the ex parte communications resigned and was later disbarred.

Former Broward County Assistant State Attorney Howard M. Scheinberg received the two-year suspension in June 2013 after appealing from the Florida Bar’s recommendation of a one-year penalty for his inappropriate contact with the judge, which violated Florida’s Rules of Professional Conduct. In imposing the harsher sanction, the Supreme Court cited “the serious nature of his misconduct, and the harm it caused to the administration of justice.” See: Fla. Bar v. Scheinberg, 129 So.3d 315 (Fla. 2013).

Scheinberg had exchanged some 471 text messages and 949 cell phone calls with Broward Circuit Court Judge Ana I. Gardiner, 52, during lengthy proceedings in the 2007 capital murder trial of Omar Loureiro, whom Gardiner sentenced to death.

The state’s first female Hispanic judge, Gardiner was disciplined by the Florida Judicial Qualifications Commission (JQC), which regulates, investigates and prosecutes Florida judges. A JQC panel found Gardiner had lied during the ensuing investigation and she resigned in 2010.

Beyond their ex parte texts and phone calls during Loureiro’s murder trial, Scheinberg and Gardiner were spotted by another prosecutor, Sheila Alu, having dinner together and allegedly discussing the trial. Gardiner and Scheinberg denied they had spoken about the case.

As a result of their misconduct, Loureiro was granted another trial with a new prosecutor and a different judge. He was subsequently sentenced to life in prison; his conviction was overturned by a state appellate court in October 2013, and the case remanded for yet another trial.

Gardiner was disbarred by the Florida Supreme Court on June 5, 2014 based on her “significant personal and emotional relationship” with Scheinberg during Loureiro’s first trial. She was also ordered to pay $8,117.18 in costs.

“Considering Gardiner’s dishonest conduct and the harm that her actions have caused to the administration of justice in a capital first-degree murder case, we conclude that disbarment is the appropriate sanction,” the Court wrote. See: Fla. Bar v. Gardiner, 2014 Fla. LEXIS 1805 (Fla. June 5, 2014).

News in Brief

Alabama: A March 2, 2014 fight at the Elmore Correctional Facility resulted in eight prisoners being transported to Jackson Hospital, where three were admitted for further treatment. Details on the extent of the prisoners' injuries and the circumstances of the fight were not released.

Argentina: Raunchy photos depicting female jail guards and superintendents in various stages of undress surfaced in February 2014, several days after a female warden, Yamile Gomez, was stabbed to death by a prisoner already serving time for murder. The prisoner, Cesar de la Concepcion, was later found dead in his cell. Argentina is no stranger to prison scandals; recently, videos were posted online that showed guards and police torturing and abusing prisoners.

Arizona: AZFamily.com reported on February 13, 2014 that Maricopa County Sheriff Joe Arpaio's new, all-vegetarian menu sparked a hunger strike at the Estrella Jail. Prisoners complained that their meals were similar to dirt, dog food and dog excrement. Arpaio, in his usual elegant form, stated, "They ought to shut up and eat what they have." He claimed the new soy-based meals save the county a half-million dollars a year.

Arizona: Terry Wheeler, a probationary guard at Maricopa County's Fourth Avenue Jail, was determined to be the person responsible for a December 2013 leak in a high-pressure fire sprinkler water main that flooded the facility and forced the relocation of around 50 prisoners until their unit could be cleaned. Wheeler was fired on January 27, 2014 due to the incident, which disabled some of the jail's electrical equipment.

Brazil: On March 7, 2014, a mini-helicopter drone dropped a bag containing about a half-pound of cocaine onto the grounds of the Centro de Detencao Provisoria prison near Sao Paulo. Prisoners surrounded the package and carried it away; guards conducted a cell-by-cell search and eventually confiscated the drugs. Visitation at the facility was suspended following the incident.

California: L.A. County deputy Jermaine W. Jackson was the first county employee to be arrested for misconduct following an FBI investigation into the sheriff's department. Jackson initially faced charges for assaulting two prisoners. On January 23, 2014, after an internal investigation by the sheriff's department, another set of charges was filed alleging Jackson had assaulted a third prisoner. Judge Roberto Longoria granted a request by prosecutors to merge Jackson's case with that of two other jail guards who reportedly conspired to cover up the assaults.

California: On March 11, 2014, a riot broke out on the maximum-security yard at Calipatria State Prison. Approximately 200 prisoners were involved in the fighting and seven suffered non-life-threatening injuries. Guards fired warning shots, pepper spray and rubber bullets, dispersing the riot in about eight minutes. No prison employees were injured.

California: In four separate incidents from February 28 through March 2, 2014, six women were arrested for attempting to smuggle drugs and other contraband into the maximum-security Calipatria State Prison during scheduled visits. The contraband was estimated to have a combined prison value of nearly $48,000. Annette Fonoimoana, Tiayesh Blackwell, Brenda Luster, Shequesha Lawrence, Taryn McGill and Charlene Lepe were all arrested in connection with the smuggling incidents.

Cyprus: The chief of Cyprus' only correctional facility resigned on January 14, 2014 after a rash of suicides and the alleged gang rape of a prisoner focused attention on the prison. George Tryphoides defended his record by citing a reduction in the population at the chronically overcrowded facility. He blamed the government, rather than prison employees, for on-going problems at the prison. Justice Minister Ionas Nicolaou told Cypriot lawmakers that 50 prisoners had attempted suicide in the last year alone.

Egypt: Thirty-seven prisoners died in a police van in August 2013, and the officer in charge was sentenced on March 19, 2014 to 10 years in prison for manslaughter. Security forces had initially claimed that the prisoners were killed during an attempted escape, but interviews with survivors and 40 other people confirmed that they died due to asphyxiation from tear gas and overcrowding in the vehicle. The van had the capacity to hold 24 prisoners, but at the time of the incident 45 were being transported.

Florida: On March 14, 2014, Richard

Masten, director of the Miami-Dade Crime Stoppers program, was held in contempt of court and faced up to two weeks in jail. He had refused to turn over information concerning an anonymous tip, and when a judge ordered him to produce the documentation, Masten tore it up and ate it in the courtroom. "We promised the people that give us information to solve murders, serious violent crimes in this community, that they can call us with an assurance that they will remain anonymous," he said. The judge noted that Masten, a former police chief, had previously emailed the tip to prosecutors, and ordered him to write a paper on anonymous tip laws rather than imposing a jail term.

Florida: Two long-time guards at the Hamilton Correctional Institute have been arrested for money laundering, bribery and smuggling contraband cigarettes, narcotics and cell phones into the facility. On February 20, 2014, Tom Pierce and Johnnie Ruth Young were fired from their positions with the Florida DOC. A cell phone confiscated from a prisoner contained text messages between the prisoner and Young, and another prisoner told investigators that Pierce had received thousands of dollars in exchange for contraband. Both Pierce and Young were released on $10,000 bond each.

Florida: On February 28, 2014, one Pinellas County jail guard was charged with assaulting a prisoner and another disciplined for not reporting the abuse and misrepresenting the incident. Detention Deputy Joel De Los Reyes summoned help from guard Adrian Nenu when De Los Reyes became involved in a verbal altercation with a juvenile offender that quickly turned violent. De Los Reyes never reported his use of force, which he later admitted was excessive, and Nenu described the assault as a "guided custodial touch" in a subsequent report. De Los Reyes resigned after an internal affairs investigation was initiated; he turned himself into the Pinellas County jail on charges of battery. Nenu received a seven-day suspension.

Georgia: Eddie King, Darius Knight, Deltonio Scott, Kevin Davis and Steven Alexander, all guards at the Autry State Prison, were arrested and fired in March 2014 following an investigation into widespread abuse of prisoners. The former guards face multiple charges that include battery, violation of oath of office, tampering with evidence and simple battery. In one incident, Davis allegedly had Alexander destroy surveillance video of an assault on a prisoner. According to GDOC spokesperson Gwendolyn Hogan, "the Department takes allegations such as inmate abuse very seriously. It is believed that the abuse did occur, therefore these officers were terminated and referred for prosecution."

Georgia: On February 26, 2014, College Park jailer Montrez Hoskins was jailed himself after admitting to having sex with a female prisoner. The unidentified prisoner spoke to authorities after she was transferred to the Fulton County Jail, and Hoskins was quickly identified, arrested and placed in protective custody.

Hawaii: As previously reported in PLN, Halawa Correctional Facility guard James "Kimo" Sanders III was arrested in January 2014 and charged with bringing methamphetamine into the Oahu prison. [See: PLN, Sept. 2014, p.56]. On January 26, 2014, another Halawa guard, Mark Damas, was arrested and charged with conspiracy to distribute and possession with intent to distribute five grams or more of meth. Damas was transported to the Honolulu FBI division office for processing, then remanded to the Federal Detention Center.

Illinois: A worker with the PACE Institute, a program at the Cook County Jail that provides GED and literacy classes for detainees, was arrested on January 22, 2014 and charged with misconduct for having inappropriate sexual contact with a female prisoner. Lester Hill, 27, faces one count of custodial sexual misconduct, a class 3 felony.

Indiana: Steven Blessing, 24, hung himself in his cell at the Westville Correctional Facility in 2012. On February 28, 2014, his mother filed suit against the Indiana Department of Corrections and individual prison guards. Blessing's mother claims Steven feared for his safety from several other prisoners and had asked to be moved to a higher-security unit; although his request was granted, he was instead told that he would be moved into the dorm with the prisoners he feared. He killed himself shortly thereafter. Blessing had been serving 10 years for aggravated battery.

Indiana: Jennings County jail guard Donald Bennett was arrested on December 26, 2013 as he reported for work at the facility. Bennett, who had been employed by the sheriff's department for only three months, admitted to smuggling cigarettes. He was charged with trafficking with an inmate, a Class D felony, and booked into the jail under a $2,605 bond. According to news reports, Bennett also admitted to delivering a cell phone to a prisoner in exchange for cash. Jennings County Sheriff's Department Major Jerry Shepherd said Bennett was found to be in possession of contraband at the time of his arrest.

Israel: Prisoner Samuel Sheinbein, a dual citizen of the U.S. and Israel, was serving a life sentence for the 1997 murder of a Maryland teenager when he obtained a gun and shot three guards inside the Rimoni Prison on February 23, 2014. Israeli police returned fire, killing Sheinbein. He had fled to Israel shortly after the murder, and the Israeli Supreme Court subsequently held that he could not be extradited back to the United States.

Kentucky: Former deputy Belinda Morton was fired from the Mason County Detention Center after investigators learned she gave her phone number to a male prisoner. Further, two prisoners reported to the sheriff's office that their IDs had been used to apply for unauthorized credit cards, and Morton was charged on March 6, 2014 with identity theft. The cards were traced to addresses that Morton had used in the past.

Louisiana: Judge Frank Marullo ordered an immediate drug test when prisoner Willis Turner appeared in court "too doped up to stand." The test returned positive results for opiates, and in response Orleans Parish Sheriff Marlin Gusman suspended several jail medical employees for not dispensing medications properly. Gusman, in a television interview on January 22, 2014, said it did not appear the drugs came "from the outside"; however, the next day sheriff's office spokesperson Phil Stelly said the jail's medical department did not prescribe opiates. Stelly confirmed the suspensions of medical staff but did not provide further details due to a pending investigation.

Maine: On March 8, 2014, two doors were left unlocked between the men's and women's maximum-security units at the Cumberland County jail, and a pair of prisoners were able to meet for a sexual tryst that lasted about 3½ hours. Jailers violated a policy that was instituted in 2012 after a similar incident. The two prisoners, Renee Glantz and Michel D'Angelo, had jammed their cell door locks with toilet paper and took advantage of the security breach to meet in D'Angelo's cell. Neither will face criminal charges, though they do face disciplinary sanctions.

Montana: PLN previously reported on the case of Tisha Ann Brunell, a prison nurse accused not only of having sex with prisoners but also attempting to intimidate a witness to avoid conviction on the sex charges. [See: PLN, July 2014, p.56; Sept. 2013, p.17]. Brunell was found guilty of 48 charges related to the sexual assaults in March 2014, and the following month she pleaded guilty to tampering with evidence. She was sentenced on August 6, 2014 to 25 years in prison with 10 suspended. A five-year term for witness intimidation will run concurrently.

Montana: Kevin Briggs escaped from a police interview room on February 1, 2014, and two Bozeman police officers were suspended without pay for two weeks for dereliction of duty. Officer Lucas Chaffins and supervisor Tracy Senenfelder left Briggs unattended for around 30 minutes. Chaffins had propped a chair against the door as he left the room, but surveillance video showed the cuffed and shackled Briggs checking the door handle then simply walking out. He was arrested in Portland, Oregon less than three weeks later.

Montana: Two guards and a prisoner were treated and released from Marcus Daly Memorial Hospital after an exhaust leak spread noxious fumes into the Ravalli County Jail on February 23, 2014. Prisoners reported a bad odor in the jail's west block and guards subsequently found several detainees suffering from headaches, nausea and burning eyes. The propane boiler was shut down and the area ventilated; prisoners were returned to the block after carbon monoxide levels were checked.

New Jersey: On February 11, 2014, a jury convicted former Essex County Jail guard Carlton Clark of aggravated assault and official misconduct for a videotaped 2011 beating of a female prisoner. Clark's attorney, Anthony Iacullo, said he and his client were "disappointed" in the verdict and would appeal. Iacullo had argued that the 40-year-old guard began punching Emirlene Philemon, 20, after she swung first. Another jail guard, Yasmina Allen, admitted she had lied in a written report in an attempt to protect Clark; she testified against him after being granted immunity. Clark was sentenced to two concurrent five-year prison terms on April 3, 2014.

New York: Leslie Gemmette, a 12-year veteran guard at the Schenectady County jail, resigned in mid-January 2014 amid accusations that he had divulged confidential information about prisoners to other prisoners and guards, and discussed security features at the jail. One prisoner agreed to wear a wire and captured hours of conversations with Gemmette over a two-day period. Schenectady County Sheriff Dominic D'Agostino confirmed on January 29, 2014 that "an employee" had been fired but declined to comment further. Gemmette also refused to comment, saying he had signed several agreements requiring the circumstances of his resignation to remain confidential.

New York: Wallkill Correctional Facility guard Wayne A. Curry, Jr. was arrested on March 16, 2014 on charges of introducing contraband and official misconduct. He was arraigned and sent to the Ulster County Jail with a $2,500 bond; an investigation found that Curry had brought unidentified contraband items into the prison.

Ohio: On January 31, 2014, a TV news station reported on the contents of the employee files of two Greene County jailers who had inappropriate relationships with female prisoners. Geoff Lewis resigned and Brian Marzluf was fired after investigators discovered they had committed sexual misconduct in separate incidents in 2013. Co-workers had reported the inappropriate relationships. In Marzluf's case, the prisoner told investigators that she had continued her relationship with the guard for several months after her release, while she was on probation.

Ohio: An internal investigation did not result in proof of misconduct, but an unidentified Ross County jailer was fired in February 2014 for "unsuccessful completion of probationary period." Officials released the investigative report on March 14, 2014 after prosecutors declined to pursue criminal charges against the guard, who was allegedly involved in a tobacco smuggling scheme.

Oregon: A commercial truck driver said he choked on a sip of coffee and passed out before barreling into a three-woman work crew from Multnomah County's Inverness Jail on February 11, 2014. The prisoners were picking up trash on Interstate 5 when two of the three women were struck by the truck; Angela Baca, 40, suffered serious injuries while Lynette Urwin, 42, and Ruby Johnson, 31, were evaluated by paramedics at the scene before being returned to the jail. Department of Transportation spokesperson Kim Dinwiddie said the incident was "super-unfortunate." The remainder of Baca's jail sentence was dismissed after she was hospitalized.

South Carolina: On January 22, 2014, a female guard at the Leath Correctional Institution in Greenwood admitted to having a sexual relationship with a female prisoner. Nayschia Anderson, 23, was charged with second-degree sexual misconduct with an inmate and misconduct in office, malfeasance, misfeasance or nonfeasance in connection with the incident.

South Carolina: Terrance Lavon Watson, 33, a Clarendon County jail guard, was arrested and charged with credit card theft and fraud in February 2014 after a former prisoner reported unusual charges on his wife's credit card. Watson was charged with stealing the card and using it to pay more than $350 in personal insurance bills. Officials said he was no longer employed at the jail.

Tajikistan: On February 16, 2014, an unnamed prison governor in the Khatlon province of the Central Asian country of Tajikistan, a former Soviet republic, was stabbed to death with scissors by a prisoner whom the governor had ordered to give him a haircut. The prisoner used the scissors to stab the prison official once in the head and 16 times in the body. The governor died before reaching a hospital; the prisoner who killed him had been serving time for a fatal stabbing.

Tennessee: Bledsoe County Correctional Complex guard Alexander Bosland was arrested for beating his girlfriend on October 4, 2014, but police were more disturbed by what they found in his home. When authorities arrived on the scene they discovered bomb-making materials, terrorist literature, assault rifles and ammo. The Tennessee State Bomb and Arson Squad and federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms were notified and Bosland potentially faces both state and federal charges. He was initially charged with domestic assault, then released from jail on $75,000 bond.

Tennessee: A former prisoner at the Maury County jail was run over by a county truck while working on a trash pickup detail in August 2013. On January 15, 2014, the county budget committee learned that Charles Allen Esmond's medical bills had reached about $109,000 – funds not budgeted for in the county's expenses and, further, not covered by insurance. Esmond is also seeking an undetermined amount of damages in a lawsuit in which he claims the driver of the county vehicle, Bobby Joe Norman, was under the influence of a controlled substance at the time of the accident.

Texas: Corrections Corporation of America's Mineral Wells Pre-Parole Transfer Facility was ground zero for a contraband scandal that led to the indictment of two former guards, 11 former prisoners and five other people. According to information released on December 26, 2013, former guards Carl James Guittard and Terrie Elaine Glover were charged with bribery and providing tobacco to a prisoner at the facility. State officials opted not to renew CCA's contract to operate Mineral Wells and the prison closed on July 30, 2013. [See: PLN, July 2013, p.38]. In May 2014, Guittard and Glover pleaded guilty to bribery charges; they were each sentenced to 10 years' probation, 240 hours of community service and a $1,000 fine.

Texas: On January 9, 2014, the U.S. Department of Justice's review panel on prison rape called on Harris County Sheriff Adrian Garcia to defend the county jail's dubious distinction of having one of the highest rates of sexual assault in the nation. A review of records between 2008 and 2010 revealed that more than 200 jail employees had been disciplined for rule infractions and state law violations related to sexual misconduct. In 2011, an internal investigation found "numerous" female prisoners had engaged in sex with guards in the jail's laundry rooms in exchange for favors. ■

Prison Bankers Cash in on Captive Customers

by Daniel Wagner

PAT TAYLOR DOESN'T BELIEVE IN GOING into debt. She keeps her bills in a freezer bag under her bed, next to old photo albums, and believes in paying them on time religiously. For Taylor, living within your means is part of being a good Christian.

Lately, Taylor, 64, has felt torn between that commitment and her desire to be a loving, supportive mother for her son Eddie.

Eddie, 38, is serving a 20-year prison sentence at Bland Correctional Center for armed robbery. He's doing his time at a medium-security Virginia state prison located 137 miles northwest of Johnson City, across the dips and valleys of the Blue Ridge Mountains here in the heart of Appalachia. The cost of supporting and visiting Eddie keeps going up, so Pat makes trade-offs.

"I would send him money even if it broke me, because I do go without paying some bills sometimes to go see him," Pat says.

Between gas to make the trip and overpriced sandwiches from the prison vending machine, visiting Bland costs about $50, a strain on her housekeeper's wages. So she alternates, visiting Eddie one week and sending him money the next.

To get cash to her son, Pat used to purchase a money order at the post office for $1.25 and mail it to the prison, for a total cost of less than $2. But in March of last year, the Virginia Department of Corrections informed her that JPay Inc., a private company in Florida, would begin handling all deposits into prisoners' accounts.

Sending a money order through JPay takes too long, so Taylor started using her debit card to get him funds instead. To send Eddie $50, Taylor must pay $6.95 to JPay. Depending on how much she can afford to send, the fee can be as high as 35 percent. In other states, JPay's fees approach 45 percent.

After the fee, the state takes out another 15 percent of her money for court fees and a mandatory savings account, which Eddie will receive upon his release in 2021, minus the interest, which goes to the Department of Corrections.

Eddie needs money to pay for basic needs like toothpaste, visits to the doctor and winter clothes. In some states families of prisoners pay for toilet paper, electricity, even room and board, as governments increasingly shift the costs of imprisonment from taxpayers to the families of prisoners.

"To give him $50, I have to send $70 off my card," says Taylor, who moved to a smaller apartment on the outskirts of Johnson City in part because of the rising cost of supporting Eddie.

"They're punishing the families, not the inmates."

Price of prison

JPAY AND OTHER PRISON BANKERS COLLECT tens of millions of dollars every year from prisoners' families in fees for basic financial services. To make payments, some forego medical care, skip utility bills and limit contact with their imprisoned relatives. The Center for Public Integrity found in a six-month investigation.

Prisoners earn as little as 12 cents per hour in many places, wages that have not increased for decades. The prices they pay for goods to meet their basic needs continue to increase.

By erecting a virtual tollbooth at the prison gate, JPay has become a critical financial conduit for an opaque constellation of vendors that profit from millions of poor families with incarcerated loved ones.

JPay streamlines the flow of cash into prisons, making it easier for corrections agencies to take a cut. Prisons do so directly, by deducting fees and charges before the money hits a prisoner's account. They also allow phone and commissary vendors to charge marked-up prices, then collect a share of the profits generated by these contractors.

Taken together, the costs imposed by JPay, phone companies, prison store operators and corrections agencies make it far more difficult for poor families to escape poverty so long as they have a loved one in the system.

Shifting costs to families

"IT'S NOT JUST THE MONEY TRANSFER that's the problem, it's the system it enables to shift costs onto families," says Lee Petro, an attorney who helped litigate for

TAKE ACTION ON PRISON PHONE RATES – CONTACT THE FCC!

After nearly a decade, the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) took action in 2013 and issued an order, effective February 11, 2014, that capped the cost of interstate (long distance) prison phone rates. This led to an almost 80% decrease in interstate phone costs in some states, and those costs are now capped at $.25/minute for collect calls and $.21/minute for debit and prepaid calls. On November 21, 2014, the FCC’s Second Further Notice of Proposed Rulemaking was published in the Federal Register, seeking public comment on reducing in-state (intrastate) prison and jail phone rates and related issues, including ancillary charges. The deadline to submit a comment for the Second Further Notice of Proposed Rulemaking is January 5, 2015.

You can submit a public comment to the FCC; even if you have sent comments before, you can resubmit them or submit new information. Please write to the FCC as soon as possible, addressing any of the following topics:

- Positive Impact of the FCC Order Reducing Interstate Calls: Let the FCC know how the rate caps on interstate prison phone calls have resulted in lower costs or helped you and your family!
- Negative Impact of Intrastate Phone Calls: While the FCC capped long distance phone rates, the order did not apply to in-state calls, which make up 85% of all calls from prisons and jails. How much do you or your family pay for in-state phone calls? The FCC needs to hear about this issue so they know why intrastate prison phone rates need to be reduced, too.
- Ancillary Fees: Do you or your family have to pay extra fees (ancillary fees) to make or accept calls, such as fees to set up, add money to or cancel a prepaid or debit prison phone account? Are you charged fees but were not told about them before they were charged? How much are these fees? Have they increased?
- Importance of Prison Phone Reforms: Tell the FCC why it is important to enact permanent reform of prison phone rates for interstate and in-state calls, including rate caps and the elimination of “commission” payments to corrections agencies. Also, the FCC needs details about fee-based video visitation services.

a national cap on some prison phone rates. Without companies like JPay, he says, "it would be much harder to take money from families and make families of inmates pay their own keep."

In 12 years, JPay says it has grown to provide money transfers to more than 1.7 million offenders in 32 states, or nearly 70 percent of the prisoners in U.S. prisons.

For the families of nearly 40 percent of those prisoners, JPay is the only way to send money to a loved one. Others can choose between JPay and a handful of smaller companies, most of them created by phone and commissary vendors to compete with the industry leader. Western Union also serves some prisons.

JPay handled nearly 7 million transactions in 2013, generating well over $50 million in revenue. It expects to transfer more than $1 billion this year. (The company declined to provide any financial details; those included in this article are culled from public records and interviews with current and former employees).

"We invented this business," said Ryan Shapiro, 37, the company's founder and CEO, in a phone interview in June. "Everyone else tries to imitate what we did, and they don't do it as well."

Shapiro says working with corrections includes extra costs for security and software integration. He says he charges only as much as he must to maintain a razor-thin profit margin.

But others provide similar services for less.

NIC Inc., a competitor that helps states set up their websites, charges a flat fee of $2.40 in Maine to send money to prisoners. Until recently, Arkansas charged 5 percent to send money through the state's own web portal. Floridians pay a fee of 3.5 percent to handle traffic tickets online.

Despite its kudzu-like growth, JPay so far has avoided scrutiny by consumer regulators.

In response to questions for this story, however, the New York Department of Financial Services' consumer division is reviewing the company's practices, according to a person familiar with the matter. The person spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not allowed to discuss active investigations.

JPay's rapid rise stems in part from the generous deal it offers many prison systems. They pay nothing to have JPay take over handling financial transfers. And for every payment it accepts in these states—prisoners typically receive about one per month—the company sends between 50 cents and $2.50 back to the prison operator. These profit-sharing arrangements, which vendors offer as deal-sweeteners in contract negotiations, are known in the industry as "commissions."

JPay's payments to Illinois last year came to about $4,000 a month, according to documents obtained under the state's open records law. [Ed Note: Tennessee's prison system received $60,789 in JPay prison money transfer commissions in fiscal year 2013-14].

Jails often deduct intake fees, medical co-pays or the cost of basic toiletries first, leaving the account with a negative balance. This prevents prisoners from buying "optional" supplies like stationery or sturdier shoes until they have paid down the debt.

Such charges levied by jails for common items are not new. The practice began prior to the rise of JPay, mainly with phone companies and operators of prison stores. But by automating the process, prison bankers make it a lot easier.

$100 underwear

NEGATIVE ACCOUNT BALANCES DISCOURAGE cash-strapped people from helping relatives, says Linda Dolan, 58, a manager for a defense contractor in California. Last year, when her son was sentenced to 20 days in jail in St. Lucie County, Florida for reckless driving, Linda wanted to buy him a second pair of underwear and socks. But the county's intake fee and daily "rent" already had put the account about $70 in the red. Linda and her husband both were out of work and couldn't afford to pay $100 for a pair of underwear.

"If relatives are putting money on somebody's books while they're an inmate, it's to help them buy necessities," Linda says. "I didn't think it was right that the county was stealing the money."

Capt. William Lawhorn of the St. Lucie County sheriff's office said that prisoners are charged a $25 initial booking fee, $3 a day for "subsistence" and medical co-pays, all of which can result in a negative balance. He said nobody is denied any type of needed service or care, and when prisoners do have money, it's used for candy and other junk food. Prisoners in the county receive payments through Touchpay, a JPay competitor that often partners with foodservice giant Aramark.

Funding prisons out of the pockets of families and prisoners has non-financial costs too, says Brian Nelson, who spent 28 years in an Illinois state prison for murder. Nelson says he has "become an asset to society" since he was released four years ago because he stayed in touch with family and priests even when he was in solitary confinement. When prisoners can't afford to maintain contact with the outside world, he says, they are less equipped to transition smoothly to civilian life.

The effect on poor families is especially harsh, Nelson says: "It's a wife that has three children at home, and her husband is in jail, so now she has a choice: Do I send money to him so he can afford to stay in touch with the kids, or do I feed the kids?"

Prisoners' need for money is inescapable, Nelson says. Those in northern Illinois are not issued cold-weather clothes, he says, leaving them vulnerable to frostbite unless they can get money to pay for prison-approved long underwear and boots.

Razor thin margins

JPAY FOUNDER SHAPIRO IS EAGER TO TELL his company's story and how he believes it helps families. It's not just about faster payments. Once a prisoner gains access to the money, JPay offers several ways to spend it, including pay-per-page e-messaging, music downloads and MP3 players. When prisoners in some states are released, they receive their remaining money on Jpay-branded payment cards that carry higher fees than those on most consumer payment cards.

Shapiro says that if his fees were any lower, his company would lose money. He declined to make the company's financial details available and would not say how much he is paid.

Shapiro serves on the board of a foundation that advocates for prisoners and carries full-page ads for JPay in its newsletters. The foundation received an $85,400 gift directly from JPay's corporate treasury in 2009.

He lives on a tiny harbor island near the northern tip of Miami Beach in a home he bought for about a million dollars. Last year, through a company he controls called El Caballero LLC, Shapiro bought a custom powerboat, dubbed Sea Block, that retails for a half-million dollars.

Heading to the company's headquarters one July morning, he stopped first for CrossFit, a military-style training regime that he enjoys because it brings out his competitive side, then for daily prayer.

Families who use JPay love the company, he says. He boasts of its well-trafficked web forum and of the 174,000 "likes" on its Facebook page, where its marketers post cheery articles about incarceration. "The Jail Cats program at Gwinnett County Detention Center in Georgia is rescuing kittens and helping to rehabilitate incarcerated women," one recent post read.

"We go out of our way to make sure that they feel comfortable—that, you know, you're spending money with a company that cares about you," Shapiro says.

If people don't want to pay his fees, Shapiro says, they can always mail a money order, except in the "couple of states" that now charge fees for them.

Nearly 400,000 people are imprisoned in states where there is no free deposit option, a fact Shapiro was unaware of during a series of interviews this summer.

"When it's up to us, it's absolutely free," he says.

Slow-moving money orders

FOR THE FIRST 14 YEARS OF EDDIE'S sentence, Pat Taylor mailed money orders directly to the prison at no charge beyond the cost of the money order and a stamp. Then last year, she was instructed to make the money order out to JPay and send it to a Florida post office box. The company would credit it to Eddie's account.

Under the new system, she says, it would take weeks for Eddie to see funds sent via money order. So Pat, like nearly everyone else she knows, gave in and began paying $6.95 to send the money from her debit card.

Across the country, delays and other obstacles make the "free option" inaccessible to many families, The Center for Public Integrity found. More than a dozen families in five different states said that money orders have been credited much more slowly since JPay took over.

Shapiro says he is "absolutely shocked" by the complaints that money orders are delayed because he had never heard of such problems before. Most money orders are processed within two to three days, he said, unless the person sending money fails to fill out the form properly. He said Virginia is especially efficient and processes money orders within 24 to 48 hours.

"We are not slowing it down, there is no conspiracy," he said.

He said JPay does "want people to convert from a money order customer to a digital customer, absolutely," but only because electronic payments are more efficient. "We're not trying to make an extra dollar everywhere we can," Shapiro said.

Before JPay, Virginia prisons credited money orders to prisoners' accounts in roughly three days, families say. Today, money orders can take more than a month to reach a prisoner's account, Marvin Rodriguez-Barrera, a prisoner at Virginia's high-security Red Onion State Prison, wrote in a letter to prisoners' rights advocates in February.

Faster to Guatemala

"I AM FROM CENTRAL AMERICA, AND IT is cheaper for my family, and easier, to send money to Guatemala than for my family to send me money from this very state!" Rodriguez-Barrera wrote. "The old way of using money orders was cheaper, easier and in many instances faster."

Those seeking to avoid the fees by sending a money order must print and fill out a Jpay-provided form whose instructions are dwarfed by large print barking at them to "Put down your pen! Put away your car keys!" because "There's a faster way to send money, go to JPay.com and sign up now!"

The aggressive marketing has worked. One former marketing director for the company lists as a key accomplishment on his LinkedIn profile that he "Converted 78 percent" of money order users to online users, boosting the company's annual revenue by $985,000.

Shapiro said the information in the profile, including the former employee's title, was inaccurate. He said he didn't have data on how many money order users convert to electronic payments or how much revenue the company gains when they make the switch.

Inside JPay's secure, fishbowl-like money order processing room, reams of envelopes sit in postal bins on the shelves. Signs around the room remind the handful of workers employed there which states allow them to deduct a fee and which offer the service for free.

In Pennsylvania, the first state where JPay accepted money orders by mail, executives were surprised to see the number of money orders plunge by two-thirds in the first two months, Chief Financial Officer Mark Silverman explained in a brief interview.

Shapiro said that Missouri used to process 30,000 money orders a month before JPay came in.

"With JPay, we drove that down to only 1,000 people sending money," he says. "And that's by choice."

JPAY's marketing materials urge customers to choose the higher-cost option. During her twice-monthly visits to Bland, an isolated work camp nestled between rolling, green hills, Pat Taylor now sees JPay-branded fliers warning of the misery awaiting anyone who tries to use the "free option."

On one side, a multi-ethnic lineup of models bury their faces in their hands and complain of what a "nightmare" it was to complete the money order, how it got lost or delayed.

"There's a better way," the flier promises on the reverse side, which depicts an attractive young woman seated with her laptop computer. For "Faster, Easier, Next-Day Delivery," families can choose from a menu of high-fee options.

Tequila, cigars and lobbying

TO IMPRESS STATE CORRECTIONS OFFICIALS and gain their business, JPay spends heavily on industry conventions attended by agency heads with contracting authority. During a 2012 convention of the American Correctional Association, the company threw what it called an "END OF THE WORLD PARTY" at a Denver wine bar that bills itself as "about you, and your inalienable right to the unbridled enjoyment of food and wine."

The invitation, printed on a disposable beer coaster, promised "a bash, JPay-style: *fuerte* tequila, hand-rolled cigars, a live mariachi band." Conventioneers could catch a JPay shuttle leaving from the hotel "ALL NIGHT LONG," it said.

For years, JPay has sponsored an award for former state corrections directors presented by the Association of State Correctional Administrators, paying for the recipient's trip and a Wexford crystal bowl inscribed with the honoree's name.

JPAY's outreach extends to state legislatures as well, even though many of the company's contracts forbid it from using fee revenue to lobby. The company has hired registered lobbyists in at least seven states. Shapiro says JPay's lawyers approved the use of company funds for that purpose.

In Ohio, it tapped Thomas Needles, a former aide to President George H. W. Bush. Needles gives generously to Republican candidates and also lobbies for for-profit universities. In Maryland, JPay hired Bruce Bereano, one of the state's best-paid lobbyists, who was disbarred after a 1994 conviction for overbilling his clients and using the money for campaign donations.

The company also sought to lobby Washington for access to the federal Bureau of Prisons' 216,000 prisoners—what Shapiro has called "the mother ship of all contracts," which is now held by Bank of America.

It spent $20,000 in 2012 to hire Park Strategies, run by former U.S. Senator Alfonse D'Amato of New York, in an effort to obtain the contract. That effort was not successful.

More prisoners, smaller budgets

JPAY WAS FOUNDED IN 2002, JUST AS THE U.S. prison population neared the apex of a three-decade climb that more than quadrupled the number of prisoners in state prisons. Shortly thereafter, as the economy went into recession, state budgets were squeezed and officials looked more aggressively for ways to cut spending on prisons.

Already, private vendors had stepped in with a solution: They would charge prisoners sky-high prices for phone services, snack foods, hygiene products and clothing, then return a large cut back to the prisons—often 40 percent or more.

Shapiro was the first entrepreneur to see how financial services might provide another stream of revenue. For a fee, he offered to deliver cash in ways that saved time and effort for corrections agencies, and often to give them a portion of the proceeds, just as the phone and commissary companies were doing.

"When we started, the states were very much saying to us, 'There's no need for procurement here because there's no one else doing what you do,'" Shapiro said in a 2012 interview. Ten years later, he said, all of them were asking companies to submit bids for the work.

That doesn't mean the door is open to competitors. Most states, including Virginia, now contract with JPay or its main competitor under a master agreement negotiated by Nevada in 2011 on behalf of a multi-state consortium. Participating states can simply sign on to the deal with one or both of the companies without the hassle of separately determining the best company for the job.

JPay is protected from other market forces, as well. When states offer its music players and tablet computers for sale to prisoners, they often confiscate radios that people already own, according to prisoners in Ohio. This leaves prisoners dependent on JPay's music downloads, which can cost 30 to 50 percent more than the same songs on iTunes, prisoners say.

The profit-sharing arrangements are at the core of JPay's origin story, Shapiro said in 2012. A couple of years out of college, he spent months driving around upstate New York, pitching JPay to "every sheriff, whether they had five inmates or 100 inmates"—without success.

Then someone in Passaic County, New Jersey suggested that they offer the county 10 percent of their revenue, "so the jail would be less of a tax burden on the community." The warden signed up on the spot.

Critics including Alex Friedmann, associate director of the Human Rights Defense Center, a prisoners' advocacy group, say the profit-sharing amounts to a legal kickback. "They charge exorbitant fees then kick back a percentage of their revenue.... The company doesn't need that for profit," Friedmann said.

Shapiro says he prefers the term "commission" because "the word kickback has a negative connotation, and it seems like some person is making that money and pocketing it and buying a Chevrolet or something, when in fact it's going to use for the benefit of inmates—basketball hoops, volleyball, whatever."

Most states put their share of the cash in an "Inmate Welfare Fund" that is supposed to be used for prisoner benefits beyond what is guaranteed to them by law. As incarceration rates climbed, however, the definition of "inmate benefit" drifted, says Justin Jones, who was director of the Oklahoma Department of Corrections until last year.

"The Legislature allowed us to broaden the definition of inmate welfare and it got to the point, almost anything they would fund through appropriations could now be paid for as inmate welfare," he says. "It ended up where we started using that money if an inmate went out to medical on an emergency and medical was end-of-year short," he says. "We bought air conditioners, ice machines, X-ray machines."

Jones was not a fan of the system. If legislatures want to impose longer prison sentences or "if they create new crimes, then the legislature should appropriate dollars for that,” he says. “I should not have to go in and redefine and stretch the definition of inmate welfare accounts.”

Double dipping

TAKEN TOGETHER, JPay and other prison vendors create a system in which families are paying to send the money, and prisoners are paying again to spend it, says Keith Miller, who is serving 21½ years at Bland for a series of drug-related, violent crimes committed in his early 20s. The earliest he may be released is 2021, when his mother will be 87 years old.

“The fact that [my mother] has to pay the fees to send the money and then the fact that [prison agencies] make a certain cut off it seems to me that [the prisons are] double-dipping into the money they’re sending,” he said in an interview at the prison. “It really doesn’t make sense to me that this should be allowed.”

Shapiro is skeptical that JPay’s fees make much of a difference for prisoners’ families. He says companies that provide other services to prisoners, such as phones and commissary, are the real problem.

“Compared to the commissary or phone revenue, we’re just a drop in the bucket,” he says.

That may be changing.

Last year, the Federal Communications Commission dusted off a 12-year-old petition filed by prisoners’ families who argued that prison phone rates were unfairly high, preventing them from maintaining contact with loved ones. The Commission capped rates for many calls under its authority to ensure that pay-phone rates are just, fair and reasonable.

Mignon Clyburn, who was acting chairwoman of the FCC when it passed the rate cap and now serves as one of three commissioners, says the action was necessary because people are “making unspeakable sacrifices to stay in touch with their loved ones.”

Vincent Townsend, president of Pay-Tel Communications, a major provider of phones for prisoners, said his industry “abused the public.”

“Ethical, right, moral”

OTHER PRISON VENDORS “BETTER PAY attention to what’s ethical, right, moral,” he said. “Because if you don’t then some regulator’s going to step in, and you’re going to have to deal with it.”

There is a crucial difference: The telephone industry is closely regulated by the FCC, which has explicit authority to set rates for pay-phone calls. Financial and consumer protection regulators have less power over pricing.

The Consumer Financial Protection Bureau can sue companies for offering unfair, deceptive or abusive financial services. The bureau declined more than a dozen requests to discuss specific issues related to prison financial services.

The Federal Trade Commission, which has consumer-protection authority and the power to ensure that markets are competitive, declined to comment “on specific companies or conduct.”

Regulators in seven states have levied fines totaling $408,500 against JPay for operating without a license. [E.g., see article in this issue of PLN]. The actions were not designed to disrupt its business, according to the Conference of State Bank Supervisors, a trade group that represents these regulators in Washington.

“State banking regulators are concerned with ensuring that businesses operating in their states are properly licensed and with enforcing applicable laws (including consumer protection laws),” the group’s spokeswoman said in an emailed statement.

“Invent a better way”

SHAPIRO SAYS HE UNDERSTANDS THE challenges faced by poor families of prisoners since JPay’s startup days, when he would spend “hours on the phone with a grandmother, talking about her day at Wal-Mart.”

He says he feels trapped by the structure of the industry he has come to dominate. He wishes the fees were lower, that states didn’t force him to charge more and give them a share and that he could “invent a better way” than asking people’s families to help pay for their imprisonment.

Yet Shapiro says he is satisfied to compete within what he admits is a broken system, even if the system may be punishing some innocent family members.

For many families, JPay has become that system. When Jewel Miller, 80, phoned JPay’s call center last month to ask why her payments are delayed, and why she must submit the same form every time she sends a money order to Keith, the operator hung up on her.

In a series of interviews it became clear that Shapiro was unaware of some of the fees related to his business. He said he did not know, for example, that Florida now charges its own fee for money order deposits after JPay processes the payments.

These fees are spelled out in JPay’s contracts with states, which Shapiro signed. Florida’s says it will charge a 50-cent “Money Order by Mail” fee.

As of July, Shapiro was unaware of JPay's own $1.95 fee to deposit money orders in Indiana, declaring, "If someone sends $100 with a money order to an Indiana inmate, that inmate gets $100.... I am positive."

Two days later, he called back to say, "We're working with the states right now to get some of those fees taken off."

So far, the fees remain in place. [Ed. Note: On November 12, 2014, The Center for Public Integrity reported that JPay had "eliminated fees for sending money orders to inmates in three states, creating a free deposit option for families of more than 100,000 people incarcerated in Indiana, Ohio and Oklahoma"].

Part II: Megabanks have Prison Financial Services Market Locked Up

ON WALL STREET, BANK OF AMERICA plays a perpetual second fiddle to JPMorgan Chase & Co., the only U.S. bank that holds more assets.

A few blocks north, however, at the New York Metropolitan Correctional Center, there exists a market that Bank of America has locked down, literally. For the 790 federal prisoners incarcerated at MCC, Bank of America controls the provision of money transfers, e-messaging and some telephone services.

The bank's monopoly extends across the federal Bureau of Prisons system—121 institutions housing 214,365 prisoners. Since 2000, Bank of America has collected at least $76.3 million for its work on the program.

When prisoners are released, JPMorgan steps in, issuing high-fee payment cards to distribute money from their prison accounts, which include earnings from jobs and money their families send them.

The banks' exclusive deals came not from the Bureau of Prisons, but from the U.S. Department of the Treasury.

The agency awarded the contracts using a 150-year-old authority that allows it to sidestep the oversight, transparency and competition typically required for federal contracting. That means that for 14 years, Bank of America has never been required to compete with other vendors who might do the work better or for less money, according to Treasury documents obtained under the Freedom of Information Act.

JPMorgan's no-bid deal to issue debit cards for various federal agencies began in 1998, was extended in 2008 and eventually expanded to include cards for federal prisons. Fees from former prisoners make up most of the bank's compensation for these cards, documents show. A separate Treasury document from 2013 said that about 50,000 released prisoners had been issued cards and listed fees of $2.00 for withdrawing money from an ATM and $1.50 for leaving an account inactive for three months.

JPMorgan, Treasury and the Bureau of Prisons declined to provide a current fee schedule for the cards. Bank of America, JPMorgan and the Bureau of Prisons all declined numerous requests to discuss the banks' deals inside U.S. prisons.

The documents show how Treasury has expanded the scope of Bank of America's contract—originally focused on managing accounts for prisoners and tracking inventory at prison stores—to include an array of services for the nation's largest prison system, from providing e-messaging to supplying the prison system with handheld scanners. The deal allows Bank of America to subcontract with other prison vendors, positioning it as a hub of prison services that are procured outside any government bidding process.

The contract has been amended 22 times in the past 14 years.

Lubricating the system

ACROSS THE COUNTRY, JAILS AND PRISONS are hungry for ways to shift their operational costs onto prisoners and their families. Prisoners need money to pay for essentials like toiletries and court fines as well as extras like higher-quality food than what is served in prison cafeterias. Their families often pay high fees to send them the money. Prisoners, in turn, pay marked-up prices for items sold at prison stores.

The oil that lubricates this entire system is supplied by the prison bankers, vendors that collect all the prisoners' money in a pipeline of cash from which payments and fees can be pulled. Bank of America's lock on federal prisons makes it a major player among prison bankers, many of which provide a range of high-cost financial services to prisoners and their families and share their profits with the prison systems they work for.

Providing services inside prisons is a growing business, but it's not new. The first accounts for federal prisoners were set up in 1930. Prisoners' families could no longer bring them food and clothing, the government decided, but instead would be allowed to send money into individual accounts. Until the early 2000s, most deposits were made by mail using postal money orders, a process that was nearly cost-free. Before Bank of America's contract, the Treasury Department held prisoners' funds.

Bank of America's prison contract is an example of how the Treasury Department leans on a power granted during the Civil War to pick and choose its own bankers and allow other agencies to avoid procurement rules that might force a competitive bidding process.

By hiding these deals from the public, Treasury "invites opportunities for waste and fraud," said Neil Barofsky, who provided independent oversight of Treasury's $700 billion bailout program after the 2008 financial crisis. He said Treasury's expansive use of the authority reminds him of what he saw while working with the agency.

"The reaction from Treasury when dealing with banks was to find a way to say no to being transparent," said Barofsky, now a partner with the law firm Jenner & Block LLP.

Treasury's power to award the deals, known as financial agency agreements, was created in 1863 to support the nation's first national banking system, around the time the greenback was introduced. Since then, the department's broad use of this power has drawn criticism from lawmakers, auditors with the Government Accountability Office, federal appeals court judges and the department's own inspector general. Treasury has said the selection process is competitive enough and the contracts are handled responsibly.

In a 1975 report, however, government auditors said Treasury was reimbursing banks operating on overseas military bases for office parties and club dues, leaving them with "little or no incentive to operate the facilities profitably or efficiently."

Twenty years later, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia overturned Treasury's selection of Citibank as a financial agent to deliver electronic benefits like Social Security, calling it "arbitrary."

And in 2008, the Government Accountability Office said a deal with JPMorgan to provide stored value cards on Navy ships was "at risk of delivering a system solution that falls short of cost, schedule and performance expectations."

Most recently, Treasury's inspector general last spring criticized oversight of a program to deliver federal benefits on debit cards issued by Dallas-based Comerica Bank. The inspector general found that officials had failed to keep tabs on fees charged to consumers and did not justify the decision to pay Comerica an extra $32.5 million for work it had promised to do for free. Treasury agreed to rebid the deal, then quietly extended its partnership with Comerica for five years.

Twenty-two amendments, no bidding

TREASURY HAS SPENT MORE THAN $5 BILLION in the past decade on financial agency agreements with a handful of banks, often without considering whether another company could do the work cheaper or more effectively, documents show.

Consider how Bank of America's prison deal has swelled in the 14 years since it was awarded.

The original contract to hold and manage prisoners' accounts and track their purchases from prison stores, worth up to $14.4 million, was amended six months later, adding up to another $1.47 million to Bank of America's compensation. In 2003, officials added telephone service to the deal, boosting the bank's potential compensation to $25.8 million. Later, the work grew to include e-messaging for prisoners.

Bank of America's contract has been amended 22 times since 2000 and the cost has swollen more than fivefold to $76.3 million, Treasury officials say. They say the Department of Justice, the parent agency of the Bureau of Prisons, has reimbursed Treasury for those costs.

The contracts say these services might help the Bureau of Prisons reduce staff time spent opening letters or entering account deposits manually. Yet they never articulate why the work could not be procured directly by the Department of Justice using typical contracting procedures.

Bank of America and Treasury designated two subcontractors to perform the work: DynCorp International, a major military contractor based just outside of Washington, and Advanced Technologies Group, a Kansas-based technology company that today shares a parent company with Keefe, the biggest operator of prison commissaries.

Neither company would have been eligible to deal directly with Treasury because financial agents must be banks or credit unions that are insured by the federal government.

Mother ship of contracts

THE BANK'S POWER TO CHOOSE WHICH vendors provide money transfers and technology partners has rankled potential competitors including Ryan Shapiro, founder and CEO of JPay Inc., which provides prison banking services to most state prisoners. He has called Bank of America's deal "the mother ship of all contracts."

Shapiro spent years trying to break through the Bank of America stronghold and offer money transfers to federal prisons—a role explicitly reserved for Western Union and others chosen by Bank of America under the bank's contracts with Treasury. He spent heavily on lobbying and involved his congresswoman, U.S. Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz, D-Fla., whose political action committee had received a $5,000 contribution from Shapiro in 2010. Still, he was unable to open the bidding process.

"They hand-pick the vendor," Shapiro said in 2012. "It's a veiled way of basically just knighting the company you want."

The Center for Public Integrity obtained contracts that covered the beginning of Bank of America's deal through mid-2012 through a Freedom of Information Act request. Both Treasury and the Justice Department failed to fulfill more recent requests for records detailing more recent changes to the program.

Bank of America's role in the system is well hidden, says Jack Donson, a private prison consultant who spent 23 years working for the Bureau of Prisons. He was surprised to learn that Bank of America chooses the subcontractors and ultimately is responsible for systems that he dealt with on a daily basis before he left the agency in 2011.

Programs like those operated by Bank of America don't always deliver the efficiency they promise, Donson said, because they add a new layer of bureaucracy. "Now the profit is going to two places," he says. "The profits should not go out to the private sector; it should remain within the agency."

Trust fund department

THE BUREAU OF PRISONS HAS CREATED A new office to manage prisoner services like accounts and e-messaging since the vendors came in, Donson says. When he started in the 1980s, a prison's inmate finance office was run by one or two people. Today there's a whole Trust Fund Department. "People have to bid out those contracts, then people have to track those contracts," Donson said.

The money prisoners spend on email and goods from prison stores is plowed back into a so-called inmate welfare fund that is supposed to be used for extra programs to benefit prisoners. Yet in the federal system in 2010, more than 75 percent of that money went to prisoner wages. About one-half of one percent of the money was spent on psychological programs. Nineteen percent went to recreational activities.

Donson said he was not surprised that money earmarked for programs to benefit prisoners actually pays for staffing and other costs.

By working with Treasury and Bank of America, the Bureau of Prisons has kept its preferred vendors in place without competition for nearly 15 years, something it could never do under normal contracting rules.

Those rules were designed to prevent agencies from favoring certain contractors and abusing their discretion, said Kathleen Clark, a professor at the Washington University School of Law who studies government ethics. Treasury's broad use of its authority presents "a risk to fairness," she said.

"It's hard for me to understand what the justification is for circumventing these rules," Clark said, "other than it's convenient and it's easier." ■

Report Spurs Investigation of Bank of America, JPMorgan Prison Deals

Government auditors are investigating exclusive contracts held by Bank of America Corp. and JPMorgan Chase & Co. to provide financial services inside federal prisons.

by Daniel Wagner

THE U.S. DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY's inspector general, Eric Thorson, will audit Treasury's "awarding and administration" of the contracts with Bank of America and JPMorgan "in response to recent media reports concerning the selection of and high fees charged by these two financial agents," the watchdog's general counsel, Rich Delmar, told The Center for Public Integrity.

The Center first reported in October 2014 that the banks have exclusive access to the more than 214,000 federal prisoners under contracts awarded by the U.S. Treasury Department about 15 years ago. The deals, called financial agency agreements, lack the competitive bidding or transparency requirements for most federal contracts.

Bank of America has been paid at least $76.3 million by Treasury to manage prisoners' accounts, money transfers, email service and other technology inside the 121 facilities managed by the federal Bureau of Prisons. The contract has been amended 22 times since it was awarded without competitive bidding in 2000.

The accounts hold the money prisoners earn from prison jobs paying as little as 12 cents an hour and supplemental funds sent by family and friends. Prisoners use the money for clothing, phone calls, food and other expenses.

Treasury says the payments to Bank of America were reimbursed by the Department of Justice, the Bureau of Prisons' parent agency.

JPMorgan issues debit cards to prisoners when they are released that contain the balance remaining in their prison accounts. JPMorgan's original contract was awarded in 1998 and amended at least 14 times. It was re-upped in 2008 and amended at least four times since then.

It is unclear how much money JPMorgan has made on the cards because the bank's compensation comes from fees charged directly to former prisoners. A separate Treasury document from 2013 said that about 50,000 released prisoners had been issued cards and listed fees of $2 for withdrawing money from an ATM and $1.50 for leaving an account inactive for three months.

JPMorgan, the Bureau of Prisons and Treasury declined to provide a current list of fees charged to former prisoners.

"As always, the Treasury Department will support the inspector general's review of this program," an agency spokesman said. JPMorgan and Bank of America declined to comment on the probe.

Delmar said the investigation was launched on October 3, 2014, a day after The Center for Public Integrity published a report on the contracts.

Bank of America's deal also drew questions from Capitol Hill. In a letter to Treasury Secretary Jacob Lew sent on October 3, U.S. Senator Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, asked how Treasury can protect taxpayers from fraud and conflicts of interest if the agency sidesteps the oversight, transparency and competition typically required in federal contracting.

Grassley applauded the probe, calling it "just the kind of job inspectors general are set up to do—to take an independent look at whether the government is getting the best deal for taxpayers."

In his letter, Grassley asked Treasury to detail all payments by Treasury and Justice to Bank of America or its subcontractors. He also asked Treasury to disclose the 22 amendments, only 17 of which were provided to The Center under a Freedom of Information Act request.

Grassley is the senior Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee, which oversees the Justice Department.

The audit may expand to encompass other financial agency agreements, a sign that Treasury's inspector general is broadening his scrutiny of the deals. In an audit this spring, Thorson criticized an unrelated financial agency agreement with Dallas-based Comerica Bank. Treasury paid Comerica an extra $32.5 million for work the bank had promised to do for free, the audit found.

Treasury has spent more than $5 billion in the past decade on financial agency agreements, often with the same handful of banks, documents show. ■

Where does your donation go? Here's some of what we've done in the past year:

- HRDC, a co-founder and leader of the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice, was instrumental in getting the Federal Communications Commission to reduce the cost of prison phone calls, which the FCC did when caps on interstate prison phone rates went into effect in February 2014!
- PLN settled censorship suits against jails in Ventura County, California; Upshur and Comal County, Texas; and Kenosha County, Wisconsin. In all of those cases, the jails agreed to change their mail policies to allow prisoners to receive PLN and other correspondence.
- PLN has other censorship lawsuits pending against the Nevada DOC, the Florida DOC and jails in Texas, Tennessee, Virginia, Arizona, Michigan, Georgia and Florida.
- HRDC settled a wrongful death suit brought by the family of a Washington state prisoner who died due to inadequate medical care, and settled a lawsuit filed on behalf of a former prisoner who lost her baby after guards at a CCA-run jail in Tennessee delayed sending her to a hospital.

PLN Support Gifts

Gift option 1

As a token of our gratitude for your support, we are providing the PLN card when making a donation of $50. The card is hand embroidered by women prisoners in Bolivia who are paid a fair wage for the cards to help support their families.

Gift option 2

In recognition of your support, we are providing the PLN hemp tote bag when making a donation of at least $75. Handmade in Vermont using hemp fiber. Carry books and groceries stylishly and help end the war on drugs!

Gift option 3

To show our appreciation for your support, we are providing the following selection of books for you to choose from when making a donation of $100. Donations of $100 or more can choose one free title. Each $100 donation entitles you to another free title; i.e., donate $500 and you get five books! $1,000 and you get everything on the page! Please circle the books you want and send the corresponding donation amount.

Gift option 4

As a thank you gift for your support, we are providing the entire PLN anthology of critically acclaimed books on mass imprisonment signed by editor Paul Wright! (The Celling of Amercia, Prison Nation and Prison Profiteers) plus the PLN hemp tote bag to carry the books in when making a donation of $250 or more.

JPay Fined in Pennsylvania, Michigan for Operating without a License

AS INDICATED IN THIS ISSUE'S COVER story, JPay, a company incorporated in Delaware and based in Miami, Florida, and the industry leader in prison money transfer services, has been fined $408,500 for operating without a license in at least seven states – including Pennsylvania and Michigan.

JPay allows consumers to transfer money by using credit and debit cards through its website and by phone, through cash transfers with cash agent locations that contract with JPay, and by mailing money orders to the company. JPay charges consumers a fee for most money transfers.

The company's contract with the Pennsylvania Department of Corrections specifies it is the sole provider of electronic fund services for state prisoners.

In August 2011, the Pennsylvania Department of Banking (PDB) concluded an investigation that found JPay had not been licensed as a money transmitter as required by the state's Money Transmitter Act, 7 P.S. §§ 6101-6018. Yet the company had been transferring money from Pennsylvania citizens to prisoners since December 2004.

The PDB found that JPay did not meet any of the Act's exemptions; during the investigation, the company was cooperative and provided information and documents to the PDB in a timely manner. Since JPay commenced business in the state, the PDB had received only one consumer complaint concerning the company.

On December 16, 2011, the PDB and JPay entered into a consent decree that required the company to pay an $80,000 fine for violating state law by operating without a license. In return, the PDB granted JPay a license as its part of the agreement. See: Commonwealth of Pennsylvania Department of Banking, Bureau of Compliance and Licensing v. JPay, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, Department of Banking, Docket No. 11-0197.

In Michigan, JPay was found to be operating without a license as required by the state's Money Transmission Services Act, MCL 487.1011(1), even though it provided money transfer services through its contract with the state's prison system.

In November 2012, the company and the Michigan Department of Licensing and Regulatory Affairs entered into a consent order and stipulation. JPay agreed to pay a $152,500 fine, and the Office of Financial and Insurance Regulation agreed to "present and recommend ... approval" of the company's application for a license. See: In the Matter of JPay, Inc., Michigan Department of Licensing and Regulatory Affairs, Enforcement Case No. 12-11449.

In addition to regulatory fines, JPay has also been sued a handful of times, including 7 times in federal court – most recently in October 2014. All of the cases, filed by pro se prisoners, have been dismissed. ■

The Best 500 Nonprofit Organizations for Prisoners and Their Families (2nd Ed.), edited by George Kayer (CreateSpace Independent Publishing, July 2014). 130 pages, $18.99

Book review by Gary Hunter

HELP! FOR PRISONERS AND THEIR families, "help" is a word that's all too familiar. And while many share problems that are similar, each situation is unique. Sometimes the problem is legal, other times it's domestic and sometimes the problem is just identifying the problem itself. The Best 500 Nonprofit Organizations for Prisoners and Their Families is a book that helps to handle issues related to or resulting from incarceration.

Putting people in prison often creates more problems than it solves. While legal issues are the most obvious concern faced by prisoners and their families, they are only a small part of a much larger picture. The Best 500 Nonprofit Organizations provides information about a wide range of resources available to assist both prisoners and their family members.

Most people are familiar with the American Civil Liberties Union and how the ACLU helps to protect citizens' constitutional rights, including those of prisoners. But few know about organizations dedicated to lesbian, gay and transgender issues; domestic violence issues; finding pen pals; and providing assistance with reentry and post-release job placement. This book identifies such resources and many more.

Looking for legal help? The Best 500 Nonprofit Organizations provides information on topics as specific as the death penalty and actual innocence to holistic resources like Prison Legal News. Whether you need to connect with organizations that deal with disability benefits or educational programs, or simply want to buy a gift for someone you care about, The Best 500 Nonprofit Organizations includes over 800 listings.

Speak only Spanish? No problem. The Best 500 Nonprofit Organizations has a Spanish section, too. This complete resource guide is categorized by subject and organization to make it easy to find the help you need, quickly and efficiently. You won't find a more exhaustive collection of useful organizations that cater to prisoners and their families.

For the past 24 years, PLN has provided its readers with details on almost every source included in The Best 500 Nonprofit Organizations. But nowhere else is this list available in one complete directory, brought to you in such an easy-to-read format. Whether you're just entering the prison system or just getting out, or somewhere in between, you can ease the burden of incarceration with this excellent resource book.

The Best 500 Nonprofit Organizations for Prisoners and Their Families is available on Amazon.com and from Inmate Shopper, P.O. Box 533, North Dighton, MA 02764, 888-712-2993, www.inmateshopper.com (price includes shipping). ■

States Renewing Their Prison Phone Contracts

As state DOCs renew or rebid their prison phone contracts, you can help urge them to lower intrastate phone rates and eliminate commission kickbacks!

The Campaign for Prison Phone Justice needs your help in:

**** Oklahoma, Washington, Montana ******

The Departments of Corrections in the above states are in the process of re-bidding or renewing their prison phone contracts. Most DOCs receive a commission (kickback) on revenue generated from calls made by prisoners, which results in excessively high phone rates. Although the FCC voted last year to cap the costs of interstate (long distance) prison calls, which went into effect on February 11, 2014, the order does not apply to intrastate (in-state) calls. An estimated 85% of prison phone calls are in-state. This is an opportunity to ask DOCs to forgo commissions and ensure their new prison phone contracts are based on the lowest cost to those who pay for the calls – mostly prisoners' families.

Take Action NOW! Here's What YOU Can Do!

Ask your family members and friends to write, email, call and fax the DOC and the governor's office (addresses and contacts are listed below), requesting that the DOC: 1) forgo commission payments when re-bidding or renewing its prison phone contract, and 2) base the new contract on the lowest calling costs. Lower prison phone rates should apply not just to long distance calls but also to in-state calls. For a sample letter or to easily send an email, visit the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice's website and click on the "Take Action" tab:

From the Editor

by Paul Wright

WELCOME TO THE LAST ISSUE OF PRISON Legal News for 2014. By now, all PLN subscribers should have received our annual fundraiser letter, which includes our last annual report. If you have not yet made a donation, please do so. Unlike many other non-profit organizations, we do not constantly bombard our supporters with pleas for money throughout the year, which in itself costs money. We only do a fundraiser mailing once per year.

As 2014 comes to a close, our Prison Phone Justice Campaign is moving into high gear as we ask the Federal Communications Commission to cap the cost of intrastate (in-state) prison and jail phone calls. We urgently need your financial support to keep the pressure on the telecom companies and prisons and jails alike. We have devoted extensive resources and staff time over the past 4 years to this issue, and more is needed. We also need you to contact the FCC and tell them the time has come to cap the cost of intrastate prison and jail calls; see the ad on p. 2.

Even if you cannot afford a donation, please encourage others to donate to the Human Rights Defense Center and Prison Legal News to support the work we do on behalf of prisoners and their families. Some of that work is ground-breaking journalism on criminal justice issues, such as our cover story in this issue of PLN on JPay and how the company gouges prisoners and their families by paying prison and jail officials kickbacks in exchange for monopoly contracts that only allow prisoners to receive money via JPay. PLN worked extensively with the author on this story, and we continue to push on other critical, cutting-edge issues that are largely ignored by the commercial media but which affect prisoners.

Among other services that PLN offers is our free daily news email list. Every weekday we send email list subscribers a digest of 6-10 stories culled from across the Internet that deal with criminal justice reform and prison-related issues. You can sign up for free on our website at: www.prisonlegalnews.org/subscribe/email.

Our new site has many additional features it did not have in the past, including multimedia and photo galleries. Plus it contains all back issues of PLN (to May 1990), a huge brief bank and publications library, and over 27,000 articles related to prisons and jails. Check it out at: www.prisonlegalnews.org.

We also have a website for PLN's parent organization, the Human Rights Defense Center, www.humanrightsdensecenter.org, and we maintain a site with the prison telephone contracts for all 50 states, the BOP and many jails around the country, as well as information on phone tariffs, litigation, legislative and regulatory actions, and much more: www.prisonphonejustice.org.

We look forward to a new year of struggle and hopefully some positive change for prisoners and those enmeshed in the criminal justice system. If you can make a donation or encourage others to make one on your behalf, please do so; you can donate online to support our advocacy work, too. Also, books from PLN's book store make great gifts, and this is the last month we are offering our Subscription Madness promotion – see the ad on p.49.

Enjoy this issue of PLN, and everyone at PLN and HRDC wishes our readers and supporters a happy holiday season and hope for a more militant new year. 🍀

Washington Ad Seg Prisoner Improperly Denied Earned Time

by Mark Wilson

ON DECEMBER 30, 2013, THE WASHINGTON State Court of Appeals held that prison officials had improperly denied earned time credit to a prisoner held in administrative segregation (ad seg).

Washington law authorizes sentence reductions for “earned time,” which is awarded for prison programming and other positive behavior. Department of Corrections (DOC) Policy 350.100 provides, however, that prisoners confined in ad seg for “20 days or more in one calendar month” are ineligible for earned time unless the confinement is not for “negative behavior.”

William F. Jensen, a former King County sheriff's deputy, was convicted of solicitation to commit first-degree murder. As a former law enforcement officer he was placed in the BAR unit at the Washington State Penitentiary, which houses “vulnerable” offenders.

In January 2011, Jensen was accused of soliciting sex from another BAR unit prisoner; he was transferred to ad seg while the allegation was investigated.

An investigator ultimately decided the charge was unfounded. “Because the investigation concluded that Jensen committed no wrongdoing, he was not placed in administrative segregation for ‘negative behavior,’” the appellate court wrote. The

DOC conceded he had been held in segregation “for his own protection and safety.”

Nevertheless, the DOC refused to grant Jensen 13.53 days of earned time while he was confined in ad seg and refused to expunge records of the investigation.

The Washington Court of Appeals granted Jensen's personal restraint petition, finding the “DOC did not follow its own policy when it denied Jensen the opportunity to accumulate earned time while placed in administrative segregation.” The DOC was ordered to credit Jensen for the earned time he should have received in ad seg.

The appellate court rejected Jensen's expungement arguments, however, holding that “DOC Policy 460.00, which Jensen cites, involves expungement of records following disciplinary hearings.” That policy was inapplicable since “Jensen was never infractioned nor underwent a disciplinary hearing for the January 2011 incident because an investigation revealed the allegations were unfounded.”

The Court of Appeals also rejected Jensen's due process argument, finding he did “not establish that he has a protected liberty interest in the expungement of his records.” See: In re PRP of Jensen, 2013 Wash. App. LEXIS 2953 (Wash. Ct. App. Dec. 30, 2013). 🍀

Fighting the High Cost of Prison and Jail Phone Calls!

The Human Rights Defense Center (HRDC) has been reporting on the high cost of telephone calls from prisons, jails and other detention facilities in the U.S. for over two decades in its monthly publication Prison Legal News. An award of funds from the settlement in Judd v. AT&T, a prison phone-related lawsuit, has allowed us to launch the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign (WA PPJ). The goal of the campaign is to eliminate the kickbacks paid by telephone companies to detention facilities and to regulate the exorbitant rates charged to prisoners, their families and others who accept prison phone calls, including attorneys. Video visitation, which is following closely on the same path as the prison phone industry, has also been incorporated into the campaign.

HRDC co-founded the national Prison Phone Justice Campaign in 2011, which resulted in a historic vote by the FCC in August 2013 that capped the rates for interstate (long distance) prison phone calls at $.25/minute for collect calls and $.21/minute for debit and prepaid calls. Those rate caps became effective on February 11, 2014. While this has helped millions of families stay connected across state lines, it did nothing for prisoners incarcerated in Washington State who make local and intrastate (in-state) calls, estimated by the FCC to constitute 85% of all prison and jail calls.

Studies show that a prisoner's ability to communicate with family and friends while incarcerated results in a smoother transition upon release and reduces recidivism. However, excessive phone rates hamper and sometimes eliminate the ability of prisoners to stay in touch with their loved ones.

We need everyone affected by this issue, including prisoners' family members and attorneys, to sign on to the WA PPJ Campaign and tell us how they have been impacted by high prison and jail phone rates. This can be done by accessing the Campaign's website: www.wappj.org. Testimonials and video can be uploaded to the site, or people can call 1-877-410-4863 to record their comments. Or comments can be written and mailed to: HRDC, Attn: WA PPJ Campaign, P.O. Box 1151, Lake Worth, FL 33460. We also need billing records from prepaid accounts (2012 to current) for phone calls received from detention facilities, to demonstrate the actual rates charged to recipients of the calls. Billing records can be emailed to: cwilkinson@humanrightsdefensecenter.org.

Lastly, any donations to fund the campaign are both needed and appreciated; donations can be made at www.prisonphonejustice.org. Only with your support will we be able to end the abusively high costs of prison and jail phone calls in Washington State. Thank you for your support, and please tell others about the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign and encourage them to join!

Massachusetts: Sex Change Ordered for Transgender Prisoner; Court Finds that Two DOC Commissioners Lied

THE EN BANC FIRST CIRCUIT COURT of Appeals is considering whether to order the Massachusetts Department of Correction (MDOC) to comply with a federal district court's order requiring that a transgender prisoner suffering from Gender Identity Disorder (GID) be provided with sex reassignment surgery at the state's expense.

Massachusetts officials appealed to the full First Circuit after a three-judge panel of the court voted 2-to-1 in January 2014 to uphold a landmark ruling by U.S. District Court Judge Mark L. Wolf in the case of Michelle Kosilek, who is serving life without parole.

Wolf held that Kosilek, 65, was denied the surgery not for legitimate medical reasons, but rather due to pressure on the MDOC not to use state funding for sex reassignment surgery for prisoners – even though GID is considered by medical professionals to be a legitimate, serious mental health condition.

In a 129-page, September 4, 2012 order, Judge Wolf found that former MDOC Commissioner Michael Maloney had repeatedly lied and engaged “in a pattern of pretense, pretext and prevarication” that was designed to conceal the real reasons for denying Kosilek surgery; those reasons, according to Wolf, included fear of public and political outcry, criticism, ridicule and scorn.

Since early childhood, Michelle Kosilek, who was born Robert, felt she was the wrong gender. Following years of struggle with her gender identity, Kosilek believed a drug counselor, Cheryl McCaul, who said “that his transsexualism would be cured by ‘a good woman.’”

McCaul couldn't have been more wrong. She married Kosilek, but after becoming furious when she caught Kosilek wearing her clothes in 1990, Kosilek strangled her, abandoned her body in the trunk of their car and fled.

“He showed up at his trial in a dress, calling himself Michelle, telling anyone who would listen that his inner woman was trying to overcome his, well, outer man,” the Boston Globe reported. “Even his lawyer seemed unsure whether to call him he or she.”

Kosilek was convicted of murder in 1992 and sentenced to life without possibility of parole; she obtained a legal name change from Robert to Michelle.

After Kosilek twice tried to commit suicide and attempted to castrate herself, GID experts recommended psychotherapy. Prison officials ignored those recommendations. By 2002, Kosilek was at high risk of suicide due to her severe, untreated mental health condition.

MDOC's own expert recommended that Kosilek receive treatment with female hormones and be evaluated for sex reassignment surgery after a year of living as a female. That was not what then-MDOC Commissioner Michael Maloney wanted to hear.

“Maloney did not regard sex reassignment surgery as an appropriate use of taxpayers' money,” the district court found. “Maloney and his colleagues ... thought that any such expenditure would be politically unpopular. Maloney did not want to authorize hormones or sex reassignment surgery for Kosilek or any other inmate unless he was legally obligated to do so.”

Kosilek filed suit, and on August 28, 2002 the court found that her GID constituted a serious medical condition. The court did not order the MDOC to take action, though, because “it expected that the DOC would begin to treat” Kosilek, and found she had failed to prove that Maloney was deliberately indifferent to her serious medical needs. See: Kosilek v. Maloney, 221 F.Supp.2d 156 (D. Mass. 2002).

The MDOC revised one of its policies in December 2002, and the following year Kosilek began undergoing evaluation for treatment. In August 2003 she began taking estrogen hormones, and two months later was allowed to begin wearing female undergarments.

However, MDOC Deputy Commissioner Kathleen Dennehy replaced Maloney in December 2003, and immediately “began taking a series of actions intended to delay, and ultimately deny, the medical care that was being prescribed for Kosilek.”

“Dennehy was determined not to be the first prison official in the United States to authorize sex reassignment surgery for an inmate,” Judge Wolf found. “Indeed, she testified ... that she would retire rather than obey an order of the Supreme Court to do so.”

Departing from longstanding MDOC policy to rely on its doctors to retain specialists, Commissioner Dennehy took the unprecedented step of hiring Cynthia Osborne, a licensed social worker who was “sympathetic to the DOC's opposition to providing sex reassignment surgery and other treatment.” The district court found that “Dennehy was not truthful when she testified that the DOC did not hire Osborne because of her predictable position that Kosilek should not receive sex reassignment surgery.”

In early 2005, while claiming she did not understand that MDOC doctors were recommending sex reassignment surgery for Kosilek, “Dennehy selectively gave interviews to some members of the media in an effort to demonstrate that she was responsive to the political and public opposition to using tax revenues to provide a prisoner sex reassignment surgery.”

As the trial in Kosilek's federal lawsuit began in the spring of 2006, public officials and the media continued to object to her request for a sex change. “Dennehy was aware of these statements, and the widespread public hostility to providing sex reassignment surgery for prisoners,” the court noted.

Ultimately, Judge Wolf found that “Dennehy testified untruthfully on many matters. This contributes to the conclusion that her stated reasons for refusing to allow Kosilek to receive the surgery were pretextual.”

Dennehy resigned in April 2007, and Harold W. Clarke was named commissioner seven months later. “The court directed Clarke to consider some of the evidence presented at trial and decide whether” he would allow Kosilek to receive surgery. However, on April 4, 2008, “seventeen State Senators sent a letter to Clarke” which, the district court wrote, “would have reasonably been interpreted as a veiled threat that appropriations for the DOC might be reduced if Clarke reversed Dennehy's position” as to providing sex realignment surgery. Further, “on April 8, 2008, twenty-five State Representatives wrote to Clarke to express ‘outrage’ at the request that taxpayers fund a ‘sex-change’ operation for Kosilek.”

Clarke received and understood the message. On May 7, 2008 he informed the court that safety and security concerns implicated by providing the surgery were “insurmountable.”

However, the “stated reasons for denying Kosilek the care the DOC doctors have prescribed are not reasonable and made in good faith,” the district court held in its September 4, 2012 order. “Rather, the defendant has refused to provide the only adequate treatment for Kosilek’s serious medical need in order to avoid public and political criticism. This is not a legitimate penological purpose.”

“Elected officials are entitled to express their views on whether a prisoner should receive sex reassignment surgery. The media has the right to comment critically on the conduct of prison officials and judges,” the court added. “Every citizen has a right to criticize public officials, including judges, too.”

Regardless, Judge Wolf noted that the Supreme Court has held the Eighth Amendment’s prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, which extends to the denial of treatment for prisoners’ serious medical needs, “may not be submitted to vote; it depends on the outcome of no elections.”

Wolf wrote that “it is despised criminals, like Kosilek, who are most likely to need the protection of the Eighth Amendment and its enforcement by the court. Denying adequate medical care because of a fear of controversy or criticism from politicians, the press, and the public serves no legitimate penological purpose.”

The district court therefore ordered the MDOC to provide Kosilek’s prescribed sex reassignment surgery “as promptly as possible,” as it was “evident that the defendant will continue to violate Kosilek’s Eighth Amendment rights if a court order is not issued.” The order was directed at MDOC

Commissioner Luis Spencer, who had replaced Clarke in 2011.

In upholding Wolf’s order on January 17, 2014, a First Circuit Court of Appeals panel wrote that receiving medically necessary treatment is a constitutional right that must be protected “even if that treatment strikes some as odd or unorthodox.”

The appellate court affirmed the district court’s findings, including “that Kosilek has a serious medical need for the surgery, and that the DOC refuses to meet that need for pretextual reasons unsupported by legitimate penological considerations,” concluding that Judge Wolf “did not err in granting Kosilek the injunctive relief she sought.” See: Kosilek v. Spencer, 740 F.3d 733 (1st Cir. 2014), rehearing en banc granted, 2014 U.S. App. LEXIS 2660.

However, in appealing the three-judge panel’s ruling to the full Court of Appeals, the state contended during oral argument in May 2014 that Kosilek does not need sex reassignment surgery because she has already received a substantial amount of treatment, including female hormones, psychotherapy and laser hair removal to make her more feminine.

“While we acknowledge the legitimacy of a gender identity disorder diagnosis, DOC’s appeal is based on the lower court’s significant expansion of the standard for what constitutes adequate care under the Eighth Amendment, and on substantial safety concerns regarding Ms. Kosilek’s post-surgery needs,” the MDOC said in a statement.

“The clinician didn’t say you must have this surgery, but that if you want it you can get it,” MDOC attorney Richard McFarland told the appellate court. He added that only 5% of people diagnosed with GID actually undergo sex reassignment surgery.

Kosilek’s lawyer, Joseph Sulman, responded that the treatment already received by his client has alleviated “some of her pain, but she still suffers from severe mental anguish that cannot be treated without the surgery.”

He added: “Under the Eighth Amendment, the standard is that prisoners are entitled to adequate medical care, minimally adequate medical care, not the care of their choice or optimal care. In this case, the doctors hired by the prison said that this is her minimally adequate care. That she has a serious medical need that can only be treated by [surgery].”

McFarland also argued that serious security issues could result from housing Kosilek at an all-male facility. He told the appellate court that if Kosilek received the surgery, her notoriety could create a dangerous environment for her among other prisoners.

But Circuit Judge William J. Kayatta, Jr. said the only reason Kosilek is considered notorious is because she has “consistently pursu[ed] her rights through the U.S. Constitution.” He noted that the corrections department already holds other infamous prisoners; also, the First Circuit panel remarked in its January 2014 ruling that the Washington Department of Corrections has “housed a post-operative female transgender inmate, also serving a life sentence for murdering a female relation,” without experiencing security-related issues.

The Court of Appeals’ en banc decision remains pending. If the MDOC loses the appeal, it would be the first state prison system required to provide sex reassignment surgery. ■

$350,000 Settlement in PLN Censorship Suit Against Ventura County, California

by Derek Gilna

IN A VICTORY FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT rights of prisoners and those who correspond with them, Prison Legal News recently obtained a substantial settlement in a lawsuit filed against the Ventura County Sheriff's Office in California.

PLN brought suit in federal district court on January 31, 2014, alleging that the sheriff's policy of limiting incoming and outgoing mail to postcards at the county jail violated PLN's right to freely distribute information, correspondence and subscription forms to prisoners at the facility.

In recent years, PLN has challenged postcard-only policies at jails across the nation with a high degree of success, arguing that such policies are unconstitutional and unreasonably restrict correspondence between prisoners and those on the outside, including their family members and children. [See, e.g.: PLN, Oct. 2014, p.23; April 2014, p.44].

Ventura County attempted to justify its postcard-only policy by arguing that contraband had been sent to the jail in envelopes and prisoners were using letters to conduct criminal activity. U.S. District Court Judge George H. King found those arguments unpersuasive, and entered a preliminary injunction on May 29, 2014 that barred the sheriff's office from enforcing the postcard-only policy. [See: PLN, July 2014, p.16].

The county initially appealed the preliminary injunction order to the Ninth Circuit, but then settled the case in July 2014. Under the settlement, Ventura County agreed to a restructuring of the sheriff's policy related to prisoner mail and paid $350,000 in damages, attorneys' fees and costs.

The county agreed "[to] not refuse to deliver correspondence to or from inmates at the County's jails on the ground that correspondence is not written on a postcard ... [to] not refuse to deliver correspondence, catalogs or subscription order forms to inmates at the Jail on the basis that inmates cannot order subscriptions or other reading material, ... [to] not refuse to deliver correspondence to inmates at the Jail that were Xeroxed, photocopies or printed from the Internet, ... [to] not refuse to deliver copies of publications from Plaintiff or other publishers on account of sexually 'suggestive' content, unless the publication contains images of exposed genitalia, buttocks or female breasts and/or graphic depictions of sexual acts, [and to] not prohibit inmates from ordering books, magazines or other publications."

The Ventura County Sheriff's Office also agreed to "conduct a four (4) hour training block in order to adequately familiarize all mailroom staff persons with the provisions of the [new] mail policy," and "thereafter conduct two (2) hour annual legal updates." The district court retained jurisdiction to enforce the terms of the settlement, and entered a permanent injunction on September 4, 2014.

PLN was represented by attorneys Brian Vogel of Ventura and Ernest Galvan with the San Francisco law firm of Rosen Bien Galvan & Grunfeld, plus Lance Weber, general counsel for the Human Rights Defense Center, PLN's parent organization. ## California Law Denying Good Time Credits to Gang Members in SHUs Held Constitutional

by David Reutter

THE NINTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS held on April 25, 2014 that a California law which denies good conduct credits to prisoners who are validated gang members held in a Security Housing Unit (SHU) does not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause.

California prisoner Manuel Francisco Nevarez received a 12-year prison sentence for robbery in 2000. Eight years later he was convicted of smuggling marijuana into prison, resulting in an additional three-year sentence. To compound his problems, on December 12, 2008, prison officials validated him as an associate of the Mexican Mafia prison gang, which resulted in an indeterminate term in the SHU at Pelican Bay State Prison.

On January 25, 2010, California Penal Code Section 2933.6 was amended to make validated gang affiliates ineligible to earn sentence reduction credits while "in the Security Housing Unit, Psychiatric Services Unit, Behavioral Management Unit, or the Administrative Segregation Unit for that misconduct."

Prior to the amendment, Nevarez earned one day of good conduct credit for every two days served. While he did not lose the credits earned prior to the statutory amendment, he could no longer earn them while held in the SHU. He challenged the amendment as a violation of the Ex Post Facto Clause of the U.S. Constitution. His habeas corpus petitions in state courts and federal district court were denied, and he appealed.

Nevarez argued that Weaver v. Graham, 450 U.S. 24 (1981) and Lynce v. Mathis, 519 U.S. 433 (1997) [PLN, April 1997, p.1] made it clear that a post-conviction amendment that diminishes a prisoner's good time credits for prior conduct violates the Ex Post Facto Clause because it effectively increases the prisoner's punishment – i.e., the length of time he must serve.

The Ninth Circuit determined the facts in Weaver and Lynce were distinguishable. It agreed with a state court that found Section 2933.6 does not punish "the criminal conduct for which petitioner was imprisoned," but instead "punishes for conduct that occurred after the commission of, or the conviction for, the punishable offense."

The appellate court noted the only relevant question under the AEDPA is whether that analysis is an objectively unreasonable application of clearly established federal law. "It is not," the Court of Appeals held. Accordingly, the district court's denial of Nevarez's habeas petition was affirmed. See: Nevarez v. Barnes, 749 F.3d 1124 (9th Cir. 2014), petition for cert. filed. ■

Battling the Administration: An Inmate's Guide to a Successful Lawsuit, by David J. Meister (Wynword Press, April 2014). 566 pages, $34.95 paperback

Book review by Gary Hunter

WHEN ASKED WHAT THE FIRST STEP would be in challenging a disciplinary charge, prisoners will give a variety of answers. Some say it is to find legal precedents. Others say obtaining witness statements is most important. But one person, David J. Meister, not only knows the correct answer, he wrote a book on the subject.

Prisoners suffer violations of their constitutional rights in numerous ways, and many times the injustice also includes receiving a disciplinary charge. In his book, Battling the Administration: An Inmate's Guide to a Successful Lawsuit, Meister covers an extensive variety of ways in which prisoners are harmed and explains, in easy-to-understand terms, exactly how an injured party can obtain relief.

While it may seem like an oversimplification, the book begins by explaining that any successful legal battle begins with preparation. Divided into five parts, Part One, appropriately titled "Getting Ready," explains why something as simple as acquiring a notebook, a calendar and charts are essential to mounting a successful legal challenge. For clarity, Mr. Meister provides sample forms for organizing the key elements (who, what, where, when, why and how) of an effective legal claim. He explains how to exhaust administrative remedies, accumulate evidence, conduct discovery and find the appropriate sources to support your claim.

Part Two of Battling the Administration explains the nuances of clear and effective writing. Grammar and punctuation are of paramount importance; an entire legal argument can be undone with a single incorrect word. Something as simple as shortening a sentence can make it more powerful. Mr. Meister breaks down the writing process into four separate sections with over fifty pages on the effective use of English grammar, legal citations, legal composition and how to actually write a legal brief.

Part Three, entitled "Filing and Litigating," is without question the best part of this book because it covers every aspect of the court process. Beginning with choosing the right vehicle to plead your case, this section of Battling the Administration walks the reader through each step of the litigation process. It is chock full of examples, sample sheets and suggestions on how to format and file a claim; it explains motions, subpoenas, discovery strategies and more. From the original brief to the final appeal, the 140 pages in this section show you how to successfully present a claim.

Parts Four and Five are the muscle of this book. Behind every successful pleading is a Supreme Court precedent. Even convicted prisoners have basic constitutional rights that cannot be forfeited simply due to their incarceration. In Part Four, Mr. Meister lists the Supreme Court standards for most major causes of action, and explains the legal theory supported by each Supreme Court precedent to help you lay a firm foundation for your claim. In short, Part Four clearly outlines your rights and how to secure them.

Part Five provides the incarcerated litigant with a tremendous advantage. Because prisoners do not always have the option of spending their days researching case law, this section of Battling the Administration provides an extensive compilation of legal precedents. It contains hundreds of case cites covering subjects such as constitutional rights, administrative rules and regulations, and dozens more.

It is rare to find a single book that will walk you through the entire litigation process, and even rarer to find such a book written specifically for prisoners. But Battling the Administration does just that. Whether you're a first-time litigator or an experienced jailhouse lawyer, whether you are suing for millions of dollars or just trying to beat a bogus disciplinary charge, Battling the Administration can help you defend your legal rights.

Battling the Administration is available from Amazon.com or directly from Wynword Press, P.O. Box 557, Bonners Ferry, ID 83805; 208-267-0817, www.wynwordpress.com. ■

Overtime Pay for New York Prison Guards, Nurses “Out of Control”

SOME BLAME PRISON UNDERSTAFFING on a weak talent pool or an inability to hire sufficient staff in the rural areas where prisons are often located. Others theorize the problem is more systemic, arguing that corrections departments and private prison companies purposefully employ fewer personnel to reduce costs associated with payroll and benefits.

Whatever the reason, New Yorkers have found themselves paying as much as double some prison employees' salaries in overtime expenses to accommodate staff shortages. According to a report from WNYT Channel 13, the top ten “overtime earners” in the New York Department of Corrections and Community Supervision (DOCCS) were paid $789,000 in 2011. And that's in spite of DOCCS' relative success in recent efforts to curb overtime spending.

For fiscal year 2012-2013 – the most recent year for which data is available – DOCCS logged 2.44 million hours of overtime costing around $107 million at an average overtime rate of $42.66 per hour for correctional officers and $53.04 per hour for sergeants. The total number and cost of overtime hours represented a decrease from the previous fiscal year.

“It's still very, very high,” said state Senator Jeff Klein, who chairs the Task Force on Government Efficiency. “It's unacceptable, and by having managers deal with the problem on the agency level, that's how we're going to reduce that out-of-control overtime in the state of New York.”

Then-DOCCS Commissioner Brian Fischer had previously told WNYT that the department's overtime spending was in part due to a nursing shortage.

“I'm not going to close down an infirmary, I'm not going to close down a security post,” Fischer said in 2010. “So it's not mismanagement, it's managing within the structure that I'm given. And right now the structure is kind of tough.”

Matthew Mercy, a nurse at the Bedford Hills Correctional Facility, received $115,373 in overtime in 2011 in addition to his base salary of $58,469. Six DOCCS nurses were among the top 10 overtime earners, averaging more than $82,000 each in overtime pay.

A DOCCS report for fiscal year 2012-2013 noted an 8.9% increase in the number of overtime hours for medical care, mainly for transportation and staffing when prisoners are taken to outside hospitals.

But the same report cited guard absences, “driven primarily by sick leave, workers' compensation and military leave,” as having “the biggest impact on overtime.” The report said that due to absences during fiscal year 2012-2013, overtime hours exceeded the amount allocated in the state budget by more than 25%. For example, while the state had budgeted for 11 days of sick leave for each guard, on average they used 14 days of sick leave during the fiscal year – resulting in an additional 424,104 hours of overtime.

Positions that remained unfilled accounted for approximately 1.58 million hours of overtime during 2012-2013. Still, the report indicated that was a 3% decrease from previous levels. Other factors impacting overtime costs included overtime to cover construction projects and comply with OSHA requirements.

Most overtime in the DOCCS occurred in maximum-security facilities. Of the top ten overtime wage earners, the remaining four were sergeants and lieutenants. Some were earning base annual salaries approaching $100,000, including Sing Sing Sgt. Eddie Josey, who received $83,797 in overtime beyond his $75,686 salary in 2011.

Commissioner Fischer refused further requests from WNYT for interviews concerning overtime wages. However, state Comptroller Tom DiNapoli said all state agencies needed to do a better job of monitoring and reducing overtime.

“Certainly if there are emergency situations, nobody's saying there will never be overtime,” he stated. “But in some agencies, it does seem like a matter of course rather than looking for effective alternatives to be more efficient.”

Texas Prison Homicides Rise Sharply in 2012, Decline in 2013

TEXAS OFFICIALS SAID THEY WERE AT A loss to explain an unexpected surge in prison homicides during 2012, when the number of murders rose to the highest level in more than a decade. But others pointed to understaffing, inexperienced guards and inadequate supervision of a large prison population composed of more violent offenders serving longer sentences.

In calendar year 2012, a dozen prisoners were killed throughout Texas' sprawling prison system compared to three in 2011, five in 2010 and just one in 2009.

“There appears to be no patterns to this,” said Rick Thaler, director of the Correctional Institutions Division of the Texas Department of Criminal Justice (TDCJ), who has since retired. “It's very random.”

“It definitely jumped out at us,” TDCJ Inspector General Bruce Toney told the Associated Press. “It definitely has not been an average year.”

Toney noted the murders were not related and had occurred throughout the state's 111-unit prison system. No one knows the reason for the increase, he said. Most of the homicides did not involve weapons other than “hands and feet kicking” and more than half resulted from fights between cellmates, which are difficult to prevent, he added.

“It's a situation where they have some kind of disagreement and it results in a death,” Toney said. “Inside a prison cell, everything is metal so that leaves the potential for injuries if someone gets knocked down.”

According to TDCJ policy, prisoners are screened for rivalries and conflicting gang affiliations. Officials said prisoners are paired with others who have similar backgrounds, past histories and medical restrictions, and who are within nine years of each other's age and within 40 pounds of each other's weight. The classification system does not take race or ethnic origin into account.

"Most all of them hadn't had any previous issues with their cellmate, at least that they'd told us about," Thaler stated.

But family members and advocacy groups question how a prisoner could be killed so quickly that guards are not able to intervene.

"So they don't know what's causing all these deaths, and they can't do anything to stop it? That's an abominable excuse," said Terrence Benavides, who has three relatives in prison. "It's their job to run a safe and secure system. And three times the number of murders [over the previous year] tells me that something isn't right."

Some TDCJ guards have cited tougher conditions in prison – more prisoners convicted of violent crimes and serving longer sentences. They believe that creates more opportunities for fights and homicides, because many facilities are understaffed and large numbers of guards are newer hires with less experience.

"Understaffing and lack of training are two big issues right now inside the agency, and both of those can adversely affect supervision," said Brian Olsen, executive director of the union that represents more than 6,000 Texas prison guards. "There are also issues with complacency and working in a difficult environment, where the inmates are more violent than ever."

Lance Lowry, a 13-year veteran prison guard and president of the Huntsville union local, the largest in the state, agreed. "The supervision of the inmates is not what it once was," he stated. "Having a turnover rate as high as TDCJ does among correctional officers means there's more inexperience out there. And that plus short staffing and a tougher inmate population adds up."

An internal TDCJ report reviewed by the American-Statesman revealed that at the end of October 2012, seven prisons – mostly in western and southern Texas – had staffing levels under 70%, a threshold when staffing can become an operations issue. The lowest staffing cited in the report was at the Smith Unit, where 48% of the guard positions were vacant.

However, officials said that at the same time the number of homicides increased, the number of other serious offenses fell. For example, reports of sexual assault dropped from 343 during 2011 to 265 through October 2012, cases of weapons possession fell from 1,102 to 837 during the same period and serious offender assaults declined from 1,222 to 1,028.

"A broad sweep of the indicators is that the system is operating safely and smoothly with fewer problems – and then this one number," said TDCJ Executive Director Brad Livingston, referring to the spike in homicides in 2012.

"Anytime we have more than zero, we are concerned," he added.

In 2013, the number of murders in Texas prisons dropped to four. The TDCJ's homicide statistics do not, of course, include executions – which are typically classified by medical examiners as homicides. Texas executed 15 prisoners in 2012 and 16 in 2013. ■

Ethics Charge Against Former U.S. Marshal Ends in Pre-Trial Diversion

by Derek Gilna

A CRIMINAL ETHICS CHARGE FILED against a former U.S. Marshals Service agent in Arizona who had applied for a job with a private prison company he previously monitored has been dropped, and prosecutors let him enter a pre-trial diversion program. At the same time, former agent Thomas B. Bullen is proceeding with a lawsuit against the Marshals Service.

The Arizona U.S. Attorney's Office refused to comment on Bullen's case or the requirements of the pre-trial diversion program, which he agreed to enter in October 2013.

Bullen was indicted in 2012 for allegedly violating a federal ethics law that prohibits federal employees from taking jobs with companies they are responsible for overseeing. In Bullen's case that included Corrections Corporation of America (CCA), which operates a detention facility in Florence, Arizona.

Bullen was a chief administration officer for the Marshals Service until 2011, when he was demoted and put in charge of overseeing the agency's contract with CCA and monitoring the company's compliance.

A federal indictment said Bullen had described his duties in an unrelated proceeding, stating: "I go throughout the facility and compare the contract with what they are doing. I make surprise inspections at all times of the day or night; and file reports with the Arizona U.S. Marshals Service and also confer with the Office of Federal Detention Trustee in Washington, D.C."

When Bullen learned CCA's health administrator at the Florence facility was retiring, he applied for her job. The indictment noted that during a November 18, 2011 interview, Bullen told CCA he did not intend to notify the Marshals Service that he had applied for the position until he knew whether or not he would be hired.

CCA offered him the position on November 22 and he submitted his resignation to the Marshals Service. But instead of accepting it, the agency placed Bullen on administrative leave and opened an investigation into a possible ethics violation. He was then indicted on one count of "conflict of interest" based on 18 U.S.C. §§ 208 and 216. Meanwhile, CCA hired someone else for the position.

Ironically, Bullen had undergone ethics training in 2008 and again in 2011, part of which covered the regulations barring federal employees from seeking employment that conflicts with their official duties.

According to court documents, "during that training, Bullen was specifically instructed that 'if an employee who participates personally and substantially in a federal procurement exceeding $100,000 is contacted by a vendor/bidder with an offer for employment,' the employee must refuse the offer and report the contact in writing to a supervisor."

Bullen was not the first government employee who failed to comply with the law when seeking employment with a private company he once monitored. Although most violations of this type are usually resolved by the employee's resignation and loss of benefits, there have been other criminal prosecutions.

Meanwhile, Bullen's lawsuit against the Marshals Service alleges that his 2011 demotion was due to discrimination because two of his direct supervisors were Hispanic and younger, less-qualified women were hired to replace him. He is also pursuing a retaliation claim.

"Mr. Bullen has filed numerous ... grievances against the Marshals Service management," Arizona U.S. Marshal David Gonzales told the Phoenix New Times. "All have been dismissed, and I'm confident this one will be, too."

Bullen's suit currently remains pending, with a federal district court denying the government's motion to dismiss on October 8, 2014. See: Bullen v. Holder, U.S.D.C. (D. Ariz.), Case No. 2:13-cv-01349-TMB. ■

Los Angeles County Jail Exploits Prisoners, Families with High Phone Costs

by Derek Gilna

OFFICIALS WITH LOS ANGELES COUNTY's jail system have been criticized by County Supervisor Zev Yaroslavsky for exploiting prisoners and their families by charging excessive phone rates. "Everyone's making a lot of money at the expense of inmates' families," Yaroslavsky said.

Prisoners' rights advocates, including Prison Legal News, have cast a spotlight on exorbitant prison and jail phone costs for years, but reform has come much too slowly. [See: PLN, Dec. 2013, p.1; April 2011, p.1]. Meanwhile, county sheriff's offices around the country have long enjoyed a steady revenue stream from inflated jail phone rates, including L.A. County.

According to a September 8, 2014 news report, under its current contract with phone service provider Global Tel*Link, the L.A. County Sheriff's Department receives 67.5% of the revenue generated from jail phone calls in "commission" kickbacks, with guaranteed minimum annual payments of $15 million. Global Tel, an Alabama-based company, provides the county's jail system with about 5,000 pay phones.

One prisoner's mother, Kim Iannone, said that after her son was arrested she received an automated call from the company requiring her to set up a prepaid account to accept phone calls from the jail. The cost to fund the account? At least $25.

Her son made one call for about six minutes and Iannone was charged $3.15. After he was released she presumed her money would be automatically refunded, but that was not the case. She was told she had to pay a refund fee of $5.00. She wasn't happy, saying: "The Los Angeles jail system steals from us."

Global Tel*Link took over the county's jail phone contract in 2008 without the benefit of competitive bidding. At that time the company's rates were $3.54 for the first minute and $.10 for each additional minute, but Global Tel later lost the contract to Public Communications Services (PCS), which cut the rates to $1.25 for the first minute plus $.15 per additional minute. Global Tel then acquired PCS and regained the county's jail phone contract in September 2011.

L.A. County Sheriff's Department spokesperson Karen Dalton said commission payments from the phone contract are used to fund education programs and upkeep at the jail, and if the county didn't "have those dollars, we wouldn't be able to provide life skills [programs] and other resources." However, Yaroslavsky noted that just because people are incarcerated, "That doesn't give us the right to fleece them."

The situation in Los Angeles County, unfortunately, is only the tip of the iceberg. Across the U.S., county sheriffs receive substantial amounts of money from phone service providers at the expense of a captive audience and their families – which explains why groups such as the National Sheriffs' Association (NSA) have opposed prison and jail phone reforms.

For example, on October 30, 2013, the NSA, American Correctional Association and Major County Sheriffs' Association submitted a joint letter to the Federal Communications Commission, expressing "extreme disappointment and fundamental concern" with the FCC's order capping interstate prison and jail phone rates, and stating the FCC had "failed to appreciate the complex and specialized environment in which inmate calling services are offered."

The organizations wrote they were not opposed to "reasonable regulation of [phone] rates and fees that inflate the cost to the consumer." However, they apparently objected to regulations that reduce the amount of commission kickbacks received by sheriff's offices.

Los Angeles County has the largest jail system in the nation, and the minimum $15 million in annual commission revenue the county receives under its contract with Global Tel is more than the phone revenue received by any state prison system except Ohio. 📰

Ninth Circuit: Prisoner Validated as Gang Member May Challenge Debriefing Procedures

by Mark Wilson

ON JANUARY 15, 2014, THE NINTH Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the dismissal of a prisoner's claim related to "debriefing" with respect to his alleged gang affiliation.

In 2007, California prisoner Ricky Gonzales was validated as a Northern Structure gang associate and indefinitely placed in segregation in a Secured Housing Unit (SHU).

He filed a state habeas corpus petition challenging the evidentiary basis for his gang validation. The Superior Court denied his petition, concluding that the validation was supported by "some evidence." The California Court of Appeal and state Supreme Court upheld that decision.

On March 29, 2010, Gonzales filed suit in federal court under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, challenging the validation process. He also alleged that the prison system's debriefing procedures, "by which validated gang members renounce their gang membership, divulge gang-related information, and earn their release back into the prison's general population," violated the Eighth Amendment because they placed him at risk of harm from other prisoners.

On initial screening, the district court dismissed the validation claims as being barred by claim preclusion due to the state habeas corpus ruling. Further, "[b]ecause Gonzales had consistently denied being a gang member, the district court concluded that he had 'alleged no facts which would suggest that [he] could debrief,' and therefore lacked standing to challenge the debriefing policy."

On appeal, the Ninth Circuit upheld the dismissal of Gonzales' 19 validation-related claims due to "the claim-preclusive effect of California's denial of his habeas petition," and provided a detailed discussion of claim preclusion based on state court habeas rulings.

The appellate court reversed the dismissal of the debriefing claim, however, finding Gonzales did "not allege that it is impossible for him to debrief, but that it is impossible for him to debrief successfully. As an adjudicated gang member, he is eligible to debrief, regardless of whether he is, in fact, a member of Northern Structure. Of course, if his allegations are true, he will not be able to convince prison officials that he has renounced his non-existent gang membership, a requirement to debrief successfully."

Regardless, "the risk of retaliation from other gang members ... inheres in becoming an 'informant,' regardless of whether his information is accurate," the Court of Appeals concluded. Therefore, Gonzales had established standing for his debriefing claim. The dismissal of the validation claims was affirmed while the dismissal of the Eighth Amendment debriefing claim was reversed and remanded. See: Gonzales v. California Department of Corrections, 739 F.3d 1226 (9th Cir. 2014).

Following remand, on April 28, 2014 the district court allowed Gonzales to file an amended complaint, "because his complaint is deficient as to the one claim on which the Ninth Circuit reversed, and plaintiff has indicated he wants to file an amended complaint to assert an additional claim." The court provided helpful instructions as to the elements that Gonzales should address or include in the amended complaint, noting that his original complaint "was needlessly long-winded because it included legal argument and general observations about the gang validation process, neither of which belong in a pleading."

However, the district court then dismissed Gonzales' amended complaint on September 11, 2014, finding it was almost identical to the claims raised in Ashker v. Brown – a federal class-action suit challenging SHU placement and conditions. [See: PLN, Oct. 2014, p.30]. The court wrote that "An individual suit for injunctive and equitable relief from allegedly unconstitutional prison conditions may be dismissed when it duplicates an existing class action's allegations and prayer for relief," and noted Gonzales was a class member in Ashker.

Less than three weeks later the district court granted Gonzales' "short and simple" motion for reconsideration, reinstating the Eighth Amendment debriefing claim in his amended complaint while upholding the dismissal of his due process claim. Gonzales had successfully argued that while he was a member of the due process class in Ashker, he did not qualify as a member of the Eighth Amendment class in that case; therefore, his Eighth Amendment claim should not have been dismissed.

This case remains pending, with Gonzales proceeding pro se. See: Gonzales v. California Department of Corrections, U.S.D.C. (N.D. Cal.), Case No. 4:10-cv-01317-CW; 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 140485. ■

New York False Imprisonment Claim Revived; Administratively-Imposed PRS Term Invalid

by Mark Wilson

ON DECEMBER 26, 2013, A NEW YORK appellate court reversed a lower court's dismissal of a prisoner's false imprisonment claim.

In 2000, Francis Moulton was sentenced to 42 months in prison on a robbery conviction. The trial court did not impose a mandatory term of post-release supervision (PRS), but the Department of Correctional Services (DOCS) administratively added a five-year PRS term when Moulton was released in 2003.

In 2006, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals held that the administrative imposition of a PRS term violates due process and is a nullity. See: Earley v. Murray, 451 F.3d 71 (2d Cir. 2006) [PLN, April 2010, p.46].

Nevertheless, DOCS did not rescind Moulton's administratively-imposed PRS term and he was arrested and reincarcerated several times for violating the conditions of his PRS.

The New York Court of Appeals held on April 29, 2008 "that only a sentencing court has the authority to impose the PRS component of a defendant's sentence and that DOCS acted in excess of its jurisdiction when it administratively imposed a period of PRS." See: Matter of Garner v. New York State Dept. of Correctional Servs., 10 N.Y.3d 358 (N.Y. 2008) [PLN, July 2011, p.45] and a companion case, People v. Sparber, 10 N.Y.3d 457 (N.Y. 2008).

Just two weeks after the decision in Garner, Moulton's parole was revoked on May 12, 2008 for violating the conditions of his DOCS-imposed PRS, despite his attorney's argument that the PRS term was a nullity.

Moulton was sentenced to 11 months in prison following his parole revocation but released in October 2008 after a state court granted his habeas corpus petition. He then filed suit for false imprisonment and malicious prosecution, seeking damages for his incarceration due to violations of the PRS. The trial court granted the state's motion to dismiss the action.

The Appellate Division reversed, holding that when Moulton's "post-Garner parole revocation hearing was held nearly two weeks after DOCS-imposed PRS was categorically declared invalid in this state, [DOCS] did not have the 'privilege' to ignore that mandate, or to find him to be in violation of any invalid PRS term or to resentence him to the remainder of his term." Accordingly, "after Garner, [Moulton] was held without justification."

The appellate court noted that "Even if the arrest warrant based upon claimant's violation of PRS were lawful, the validity and lawfulness of that detention evaporated in the wake of Garner." See: Moulton v. New York, 114 A.D.3d 115, 977 N.Y.S.2d 797 (N.Y. App. Div. 3d Dep't 2013). ■

$690,000 Settlement in HRDC Suit Over Death of Prisoner's Baby at CCA Jail

by Derek Gilna

IN AUGUST 2014, CORRECTIONS CORPORATION of America (CCA), the nation's largest for-profit prison firm, settled a federal lawsuit filed by PLN's parent organization, the Human Rights Defense Center (HRDC), on behalf of a former prisoner held at the CCA-operated Silverdale Detention Facility – a county jail in Chattanooga, Tennessee. The suit alleged deliberate indifference in connection with CCA staff's handling of the prisoner's pregnancy, resulting in the death of her baby.

The settlement, executed by the parties on August 9, 2014, included the payment of $690,000 to former prisoner Countess Clemons, who was 18 years old and pregnant when she was housed at Silverdale in November 2010 and went into premature labor. She was serving a misdemeanor sentence at the time and had no felony record. It was her first pregnancy.

In her complaint, Clemons alleged that CCA had violated her rights “under the First, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments of the United States Constitution and the laws of Tennessee when they knowingly and with deliberate indifference ... denied her and her child reasonable medical treatment for serious medical conditions, thereby causing her extensive physical and emotional pain and suffering and the death of her son.”

Although CCA's own institutional policy specifically notes that “incarcerated females have a high percentage of increased-risk pregnancies,” staff at Silverdale did not provide adequate medical care when Clemons experienced premature labor.

At around 5:00pm on November 19, 2010, when Clemons was approximately five months pregnant, she and several other prisoners notified CCA Officer Badger that Clemons was having severe abdominal pain and vaginal bleeding. There was a delay before she was able to see a nurse, who was busy distributing medication.

When Clemons finally saw CCA nurse Teresa Smith several hours later, after 7:00pm, she was clearly in great pain, unable to sit in a chair and had to lie down on the floor due to her discomfort. Nurse

Smith received permission from an off-site doctor to have Clemons taken to a hospital emergency room, and entered an order to that effect at 7:43pm.

However, Clemons was instead taken by wheelchair to a cell in an intake processing area at the CCA jail. The cell had a bare “bench” with no mattress. She was left in the cell for over two hours, during which time she began having contractions, bled heavily from her vagina, vomited and pleaded for help.

She was told by another CCA staff member, Officer Garcia, that she had to wait because it was “count time” and because various “codes” had been called at the facility.

Clemons' pants were soaked as a result of her water breaking and bleeding, and a CCA employee brought her another pair of pants. According to a prisoner later tasked with cleaning the intake cell, the cell's floor was covered in blood.

After several hours, Nurse Smith realized that Clemons had not yet been taken to the hospital as ordered. An ambulance was summoned and she was transported to Erlanger Hospital. Despite the efforts of hospital staff, it was too late to save her baby, Roland LeBron Clemons, who was born, lived just over an hour and then died. The state issued a certificate of live birth.

According to Erlanger's medical records, Clemons did not arrive at the hospital until 10:32pm – more than five hours after she first sought help from CCA staff. An Erlanger physician indicated that had she made it to the hospital earlier, they might have been able to save her baby's life.

However, Clemons' traumatic experience was not yet over. CCA officers initially refused to let her call her family from the hospital to inform them about the death of her baby, but hospital staff insisted and she was finally allowed to make a call. She was then returned to Silverdale handcuffed, shackled and with a waist chain and black box. A CCA counselor asked her if she “blamed God” for the death of her baby; Clemons replied that she blamed CCA.

Following her return to Silverdale on November 20, 2010, she filed an informal grievance noting the delay in seeing a nurse, her vaginal bleeding and the fact that Officer Garcia had refused to help her because it was count time. The response to the grievance indicated that there was video footage of the events of November 19; however, CCA staff said no changes would be made in the jail's policies.

Clemons was released on furlough to attend her baby's funeral and retained the Human Rights Defense Center to represent her in a wrongful death lawsuit against CCA. HRDC sent a letter to the company, demanding that CCA preserve evidence related to the incident, including any videotape. HRDC also arranged for a grief counselor to meet with Clemons at Silverdale while she served the remainder of her sentence. She was released in April 2011, and HRDC filed lawsuits in both state and federal court in Chattanooga, Tennessee on November 17, 2011.

CCA later admitted that it had preserved the wrong video – saving the tape from November 18 instead of the 19th – and had destroyed the latter tape despite HRDC's letter to retain evidence in the case.

Clemons filed for sanctions, alleging that CCA was negligent in failing to preserve the correct video. CCA argued the destruction of the video was inadvertent, since it customarily only retains the footage for 90 days, at which time it tapes over the video, and a part-time employee had mistakenly copied the footage from the wrong date. Assistant Warden Michael T. Quinn failed to ensure the correct video had been kept.

After reviewing the pleadings, U.S. District Court Judge Curtis L. Collier held on July 14, 2014 that the destruction of the video constituted gross negligence which caused a “significant burden ... on Plaintiffs,” and agreed that attorney fees and costs were an appropriate sanction. The judge also ruled that a “mandatory inference instruction” would be given to the jury at the scheduled trial, finding that “[s]uch a sanction is appropriate to account for the culpability of CCA and remedy the prejudice to Plaintiffs.” Accordingly, the jury would be instructed that the missing video footage would have been unfavorable to the company.

CCA agreed to settle the lawsuit the following month for $690,000, inclusive of attorney fees and costs, after protracted litigation, extensive discovery, numerous depositions and the retention of medical experts. Twenty-two other female prisoners at Silverdale had provided statements in support of Clemons regarding the events of November 19, 2010.

Unfortunately, the death of Clemons’ newborn son was not the first time a pregnant prisoner had been denied medical care at a CCA facility, nor would it be the last.

In 2005, Jennifer Bozeman, 26, gave birth in the infirmary at the CCA-operated Bay County Jail in Florida after complaining of labor pains for over four hours. Her baby was airlifted to a hospital, where it was treated for birth defects. CCA subsequently released a 32-page report that documented mistakes and policy violations the night that Bozeman went into labor. [See: PLN, July 2006, p.1].

Meredith Manning, 23, gave birth during her incarceration at the CCA-run Metro-Davidson County Detention Facility in Nashville, Tennessee in 2004. She was reportedly left bleeding for three days in a solitary cell and ignored by CCA staff. Her baby was born after she was finally taken to a hospital, and lived for only three hours. [See: PLN, Feb. 2006, p.1]. Manning filed suit, and a former CCA nurse filed an affidavit on her behalf. The case settled for $250,000. See: Manning v. CCA, Third Circuit Court for Davidson County, Tennessee, Civil Action No. 05C-2608.

Rosalyn Bradford, 23, suffered from an undiagnosed ectopic pregnancy at the Silverdale Detention Facility in 1987; according to news reports she was left screaming in pain in her cell for almost 12 hours before being taken to a hospital, where she died. [See: PLN, Feb. 1993, p.2].

And in June 2012, Autumn Miller, a prisoner at the Dawson State Jail in Texas, gave birth in a toilet at the facility to a baby girl, Gracie, who died four days later. [See: PLN, July 2013, p.38].

Thus, including Countess Clemons, there are at least five known cases of pregnant prisoners being denied adequate medical care at CCA facilities, resulting in the death of one prisoner and four of their babies.

Private prison operators such as CCA, which confine approximately 8% of all state and federal prisoners in the United States, have often been accused of understaffing, inadequately training their employees and restricting prisoners’ access to necessary medical treatment as a means of cutting costs in order to increase profits.

Clemons was represented by HRDC general counsel Lance Weber, Memphis, Tennessee attorney Andy C. Clarke and Arkansas attorney Luther Sutter. See: Clemons v. Corrections Corporation of America, U.S.D.C. (E.D. Tenn.), Case No. 1:11-cv-00339-CLC-WBC. ■

Despite Reforms, Shackling of Pregnant Prisoners Persists

IN 2011, VALERIE NABORS WAS SERVING a sentence at Nevada's Florence McClure Women's Correctional Center in Las Vegas for stealing more than $250 in casino chips. She was pregnant and went into labor while incarcerated. Nabors was handcuffed and taken to an ambulance where guards shackled her ankles together, even though Nevada had previously outlawed the use of restraints on pregnant prisoners during labor and delivery.

Guards refused to remove the shackles when an ambulance supervisor protested, and again at the hospital when a nurse questioned their use. Finally, the guards complied after a delivery room nurse insisted the restraints be removed, and Nabors underwent an emergency cesarean section. Within 10 minutes of the surgery, however, guards again shackled Nabors' ankles and chained her to the bed.

During the ordeal, Nabors suffered a separation of her pubic bones and several pulled muscles in her groin, which her physician determined were a direct result of the restraints. "We were shocked," said Staci Pratt of the ACLU of Nevada. "And it takes a lot to shock an ACLU attorney."

After suing the Nevada Department of Corrections, the state paid Nabors a $130,000 settlement in January 2014. See: Nabors v. Nevada DOC, U.S.D.C. (D. Nev.), Case No. 2:12-cv-01044-LRH-VCF. Two months later the Nevada Board of State Prison Commissioners adopted new rules, including training requirements for guards and oversight regulations.

Unfortunately, Nabors' experience is not an isolated one.

"Pregnant women are the most vulnerable and the least threatening in the prison system and should rarely, if ever, be restrained," noted Alicia M. Walters, a reproductive justice advocate with the ACLU of Northern California. Yet pregnant prisoners in 29 states can be shackled to their hospital beds during childbirth, even when confined for only immigration-related offenses. [See: PLN, Sept. 2012, p.14].

According to the U.S. Department of Justice's Bureau of Justice Statistics, approximately 40,000 pregnant women are sentenced to prison annually. Many are serving time for non-violent crimes and pose little flight risk, yet most are shackled during childbirth.

"Just because they may be arrested for a nonviolent offense does not mean that's going to match their behavior," declared Beth Arthur, president of the Virginia Sheriffs' Association.

Those in the medical community generally agree that shackling pregnant prisoners creates a risk for both mother and child.

"Pregnant women in correctional facilities are more likely to experience miscarriage, preeclampsia, pre-term birth, and low birth weight infants, all of which seriously jeopardize the health of the mother and, in many cases, her newborn," stated California Assemblywoman Toni Atkins. "Shackling increases these risks by causing women to fall and by making emergency medical care more difficult to administer."

In a case arising out of Arkansas, in 2009 the 8th Circuit Court of Appeals held there is a clearly established right for pregnant prisoners to not be shackled while in labor. See: Nelson v. Corr. Med. Servs., 583 F.3d 522 (8th Cir. 2009) (en banc) [PLN, April 2010, p.20].

A 2010 American Medical Association resolution deemed the practice "barbaric," unsafe and "medically hazardous," and banned the use of restraints during labor or delivery. [See: PLN, Dec. 2010, p.48]. And the American Correctional Association encouraged states to adopt written policies prohibiting the use of restraints on pregnant prisoners. Not all states have followed those recommendations, however.

"The whole attitude of law enforcement officers [is] that an inmate is an inmate, and every inmate is a flight and safety risk," said Virginia lawmaker Patrick A. Hope, who twice tried unsuccessfully to introduce bills to ban the shackling of pregnant prisoners. His 2011 bill did not even make it to a vote.

After legislative proposals failed, the Virginia Board of Corrections amended its rules on November 14, 2012 to restrict the use of restraints on pregnant prisoners. But advocates said a law is still needed to require prison staff to publicly report when prisoners are restrained under exceptions to the new rules.

As of July 2014, only 21 states had passed legislation to limit or ban the shackling of pregnant prisoners during labor and delivery, while a federal statute applies to the Bureau of Prisons.

"It blows my mind that I have to sign a law for that," said Massachusetts Governor Deval Patrick on May 19, 2014, after his signature made Massachusetts the most recent state to restrict placing restraints on pregnant prisoners.

The law, which took effect immediately, has been hailed as providing the most comprehensive health and safety standards for imprisoned pregnant women to date; in addition to limiting the kinds of restraints that prison guards can use and the situations in which they can use them, it requires that pregnant prisoners always be transported in vehicles with seatbelts, and mandates that such prisoners be provided with proper medical care, nutrition and basic necessities such as maternity clothes.

Massachusetts was the third state to adopt anti-shackling legislation in 2014. A week earlier, Minnesota Governor Mark Dayton signed a similar bill into law, and in April 2014 an anti-shackling bill was adopted in Maryland. Anti-shackling legislation was also introduced in Iowa, New Jersey and the District of Columbia this year. Yet even in some states that outlaw or limit restraints, pregnant prisoners are still being shackled.

"Correctional institutions are incredibly opaque. It's often very difficult to get information on what's happening," said Gavi Wolfe, legislative counsel for the ACLU of Massachusetts. "They don't rigorously monitor the use of restraints, especially when it's been a part of their practice for a long time, and one they haven't thought to scrutinize. Our prison culture has gone so far in the direction of all practices being OK in the name of security – even when security isn't an issue – that we have, in general, lost sight of humanity in the face of reflexive prison policies."

California is estimated to have the nation's third-largest population of women in prison, putting the state at the forefront of this issue.

"In 2005, California became one of the first states to prohibit shackling of incarcerated pregnant women during labor, delivery, and recovery after childbirth," wrote Walters, with the ACLU of Northern California. On September 28, 2012, the state went further by enacting one of the nation's first laws that completely bans the shackling of pregnant prisoners (Penal Code § 3407).

However, a survey conducted by Legal Services for Prisoners with Children (LSPC), a San Francisco-based advocacy group, determined that while 21 California counties are in full compliance with the new law, almost two-thirds are not.

"We see it as very promising that dozens of counties have already taken steps to comply with this law," LSPC policy director Jesse Stout said upon the survey's release in February 2014. "But we still see a need for more work, since there are still dozens of counties that have compliance issues that do not fully follow these very basic health and safety protections for pregnant women."

The California statute prohibits using leg irons, waist chains or handcuffs behind the body on pregnant prisoners; it further states that they should be restrained in alternative ways – such as handcuffed in front of their bodies – only if absolutely necessary for the safety of the public or other prisoners. Finally, the law removes from prison guards the final say on removing restraints, and instead gives that authority to medical professionals.

In a statement, the California Board of State and Community Corrections responded to the LSPC survey by questioning its methodology. "It's important to note that the report cites no evidence that women are being shackled contrary to law," the statement said. "The question it raises concerns whether counties are compliant in developing written policies and are notifying inmates of those policies."

Called a "victory" for incarcerated women, the California law is actually quite rare. Advocacy groups are lobbying for federal standards and shackling bans in the states that still authorize the practice, but say the results have been less than encouraging.

The non-profit Correctional Association of New York, which monitors conditions in New York prisons, noted that shackling remains commonplace despite a 2009 state law. The group surveyed 27 women who gave birth in prison since the law was enacted and found that 23 reported having been shackled just before, during or after delivery.

"The law was put in place because New York State recognized that these practices are an affront to human rights and decency," said Tamar Kraft-Stolar, who directs the association's Women in Prison Project. "The fact that it's being routinely violated is egregious."

In 1999, Illinois became the first state in the nation to ban the shackling of prisoners who were in labor or being transported to a hospital. Yet scores of women have come forward with stories of restraints being removed only in the moments before delivery, or not at all.

In 2007, 18-year-old Cora Fletcher was eight months pregnant when she was booked into the Cook County Jail in Chicago for missing a court date on a retail theft charge. A prenatal checkup detected no fetal heartbeat, so Fletcher was sent to a hospital where a medical team attempted to induce labor. Both her hands and feet were shackled to the bed until she went into labor, then only one hand and foot were released as she gave birth to her stillborn child.

Fletcher was one of 80 women who filed a class-action lawsuit against Cook County, alleging that they were restrained during in-custody births between September 2007 and June 2010.

In April 2010, the county amended its policies to provide that pregnant prisoners could be handcuffed but that shackles and belly chains could no longer be used. The policy was changed again in February 2011, dictating that restraints should not be used at all unless the prisoner poses a security or flight risk. Similar legislation was signed into law in January 2012 by Illinois Governor Pat Quinn.

On May 22, 2012, U.S. District Court Judge Amy St. Eve preliminarily approved a $4.1 million settlement in the class-action suit against Cook County, providing each plaintiff with an average of $35,000, according to attorney Thomas Morrissey. He said the more important victory, however, was the fact that “we actually stopped the practice” of shackling pregnant prisoners at the Cook County jail.

Yet despite the class-action lawsuit, settlement and subsequent reforms, the defendants admitted no wrongdoing and said they settled the case only for the sake of expediency. [See: PLN, March 2013, p.31].

“This settlement is probably the most fair and efficient way to end this lawsuit and to prevent further cost to taxpayers,” said Cook County Sheriff’s Office spokesman Frank Bilecki. “The County sheriff’s office strictly prohibits the use of security restraints on pregnant women in custody absent of unusual circumstances,” he added, and boasted that Cook County’s treatment of female detainees is the “most progressive in the nation” – but without acknowledging that litigation had compelled reforms.

Such lawsuits are critical to ensure that prisons and jails comply with anti-shackling laws, according to Danyell Williams, a former midwife for prisoners in Philadelphia. “These laws were passed and everybody patted themselves on the back for doing what was right and human and then went on about their business,” she said. “But there’s no policing entity that’s really going to hold these institutions responsible.”

Similar horror stories and lawsuits have been reported across the nation, most notably in Arizona’s Maricopa County. “It doesn’t surprise me that these cases have gotten a lot of media attention,” said the ACLU’s Walters. “A lot of organizations are watching that county closely because of Sheriff Joe [Arpaio],” who is well known for his abusive treatment of prisoners.

“Women and unborn children should be treated with basic human dignity,” observed Heather Rice, director of the U.S. Prisons and Policy Program for the National Religious Campaign Against Torture. “No woman who is in one of the most precarious situations and circumstances ... should have to unnecessarily go through being restrained.”

In the majority of states that have not adopted anti-shackling laws, however, they do. ■

Disabled California Juvenile Detainees Entitled to Special Education Services in Jail

by Mark Wilson

THE CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT HELD on December 12, 2013 that state law requires disabled juvenile offenders to continue receiving special education services while incarcerated.

Under California Education Code § 56041, juveniles between 18 and 22 years old who suffer from learning disabilities, speech or language impairments are entitled to receive special education and related services.

Michael Garcia became eligible for special education services in the second grade, when he was identified as having learning deficiencies and speech and language impairments. Sometime after his sixteenth birthday, Garcia was arrested on felony charges and detained in juvenile hall. While there he received special education services through the Los Angeles County Office of Education.

When he turned eighteen, Garcia was transferred to the Los Angeles County Jail (LACJ) in June 2008, to await trial. Although he was still eligible for special education services, none were offered at the jail because no education agency took responsibility for providing those services.

The Disability Rights Legal Center (DRLC) and co-counsel Milbank, Tweed, Hadley & McCloy, LLP filed suit in federal court, challenging the jail’s failure to provide special education services to Garcia and other qualified juvenile detainees.

In May 2010 the district court held that under § 56041, the Los Angeles Unified School District (LAUSD) was responsible for providing special education services to Garcia and other LACJ juvenile detainees. LAUSD appealed and the Ninth Circuit issued a stay, asking the California

Supreme Court to decide whether § 56041 applies “to children who are incarcerated in county jails.” See: LAUSD v. Garcia, 669 F.3d 956 (9th Cir. 2012).

The Supreme Court agreed to decide the issue. “Although section 56041 does not by its terms specifically address county jail inmates,” the Court concluded that “the statutory language is broad enough to encompass special education programs for eligible county jail inmates between the ages of 18 and 22 years.” See: LAUSD v. Garcia, 58 Cal.4th 175, 314 P.3d 767 (Cal. 2013).

“With this ruling by the California Supreme Court, we can proceed with the class action to develop a systemic resolution that will ensure that all eligible students in LA County Jails are provided the special education and related services to which they are entitled under state and federal law,” said Milbank special counsel Delilah Vinzon.

“Michael is just one of many students with disabilities in a custodial setting who needs special education services – these services help Michael, and others like him, be successful in life and obtain gainful employment upon release,” added DRLC attorney Anna Rivera. “It’s through education that we break the cycle of recidivism.”

Following the state Supreme Court’s decision, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the district court on January 28, 2014, holding that “the Los Angeles Unified School District was responsible for providing special education services to Michael Garcia” while he was held at the county jail. See: LAUSD v. Garcia, 741 F.3d 922 (9th Cir. 2014). ■

Former Florida Guard Accused of Workers' Comp Fraud Dies Before Trial

LESS THAN EIGHT WEEKS BEFORE A former Florida prison guard was scheduled to go to trial on charges of fraudulently collecting nearly $3 million in workers' compensation, he died in a Tampa hospital. Doctors listed his cause of death as lung failure.

David Brownell, 48, left behind a wife who was furious with the state for what she contended was a deliberate effort to besmirch her husband's name and discredit the medical condition that eventually killed him.

Brownell was arrested in November 2012 on a felony insurance fraud charge. He had filed a workers' compensation claim in 1995 alleging that his exposure to rats and rat feces at the Glades Correctional Institution (GCI) caused him respiratory problems and a dependency on oxygen. Florida's Division of Risk Management paid him more than $2.7 million over the next 17 years, including around $563,000 in lost income.

Brownell made statements under oath about his disabilities. However, the Florida Department of Financial Services' Division of Insurance Fraud produced video footage taken over several years that indicated Brownell's condition appeared to be less severe than he had claimed. In the videos he was seen playing guitar in a band, attending a concert, driving and smoking cigarettes.

While Brownell could occasionally drive, play his guitar and attend concerts, the claim that he smoked cigarettes was a lie, said his widow, Candace Brownell, 55. "He never smoked a day in his life," she stated.

None of the videos showed Brownell wearing an oxygen mask, but Candace said her husband did not need to be on oxygen constantly. In fact, doctors had advised him to not use his oxygen tank all the time.

"They edited the [surveillance] tapes and only showed ones of him without oxygen," Candace complained. "Where's all the videotape of him with oxygen or throwing up in the front yard because he couldn't quite make it home – or all the trips to the hospital?"

Brownell made more than a dozen hospital visits over the past four years,

Candace said. Doctors had diagnosed her husband with a rare form of pneumonia and also found he suffered from idiopathic pulmonary fibrosis, or scarring of the lungs. Brownell was placed on a lung transplant list ten days before he died on October 16, 2013.

"We were saddened to hear of Mr. Brownell's passing and our sympathies are with his family," the Division of Insurance Fraud said in a written statement. "The investigation was never about whether he was ill or not, but rather the contrast between how he was representing his physical limitations to doctors and what he was actually capable of doing."

Candace Brownell was also angry that the state made it appear her husband had profited from his workers' compensation payments, most of which she said went to medical providers.

Brownell faced up to 30 years in prison and had been worried about his trial, which was scheduled for early December 2013.

"He [had] a nerve stimulator in his back, a port installed in his chest, a feeding tube hanging out of his stomach," Candace stated. "How would you be able to convince a jury he was faking it?"

Brownell's workers' comp claim was similar to a lawsuit filed by then-GCI prisoner and PLN contributing writer David Reutter in 1994. Reutter alleged that GCI was infested with rats, and rat feces had possibly subjected him to Hantavirus, a respiratory disease. A state court judge denied his motion for a preliminary injunction despite a guard's testimony that he had been bitten by a rat when reaching for his lunch in a cabinet in the guards' station, resulting in the guard receiving workers' compensation for several weeks. ■

Debtors' Prisons Prevail in Las Vegas, Thanks to Prosecutors and Casino Markers Law

by Derek Gilna

ANYONE WHO HAS EVER BEEN THREAT-ened with jail or actually locked up for passing a bad check or failing to pay a debt knows that so-called "debtors' prisons" are alive and well in the United States. [See: PLN, Nov. 2013, p.20]. But few states can match Nevada for pursuing criminal charges against people who owe money, especially to the state's powerful casino industry.

In Nevada, failure to pay "gambling markers" – loans that casinos make to patrons to encourage gambling – is considered the same as writing a bad check under NRS 205.130(1)(e). Further, state law presumes that the debtor is guilty until proven innocent.

But a California businessman is challenging those presumptions.

The Nevada Supreme Court is currently considering the appeal of Harel Zahavi, 53, who was convicted in 2011 on four felony counts of passing bad checks and sentenced to 12 to 34 months in prison on each count. His prison term was suspended and he was placed on probation and ordered to pay fines.

Zahavi, who once ran a thriving ice cream business in southern California, had been indicted on charges that he failed to repay $384,000 in debts to four Las Vegas casinos that extended him gambling credit from October through December 2008.

According to testimony at his trial, Zahavi had a history of gambling – spending approximately $50 million at Nevada casinos over a ten-year period, including $8.3 million at one of the casinos involved in the bad debt charges.

Under Nevada law, casino markers have the same legal status as checks, giving casinos the right to withdraw the funds owed from the gambler's bank account. If the account contains insufficient funds (NSF) to cover the amount of the markers, the law presumes that the gambler intended to defraud the casino by not paying the debt, even if the bank account held sufficient funds to pay the markers at the time they were granted.

Zahavi's attorney, Matt Lay, argued before the state's high court that the casinos issued gambling markers to his client even though they knew, or should have known, that he did not have sufficient funds in his bank account. They should never have issued Zahavi more credit, Lay maintained, and such credit is similar to short-term loans.

However, Clark County Chief District Attorney Bernard Zadrowski countered that casinos first check players' bank accounts and determine their average balances in recent months before they extend credit. He told the Nevada Supreme Court that casinos have "no affirmative duty to alert" the gambler that his or her account lacks funds before cashing the markers.

Under state law, when gamblers agree to take a marker, they stipulate that they have sufficient funds to pay the debt, Zadrowski argued. Casinos can cash markers at any agreed upon time, typically 30 days or less – though the time period may be longer.

Lay noted that one of the four casinos determined that Zahavi had $27,000 in his bank account, but still extended him $100,000 in markers. He said the other three casinos had not checked Zahavi's bank records for at least two months before granting him more credit.

As a result – and because the casinos failed to stop Zahavi from gambling – he could not be convicted of criminal fraud, Lay concluded.

Legal experts say the issues in the case run deeper than simply one gambler who was criminally prosecuted for running up unpaid gambling debts. The bigger picture, they claim, is that Las Vegas casinos use state law – and specifically the formidable power of the District Attorney's office – as a means of debt collection. Also, the D.A. is allowed to collect a 5-10% fee from the defendant in addition to any monetary settlement.

Under Nevada law, individuals who fail to pay casino markers typically face criminal prosecution under five statutes:

- Making False Statements to Obtain Benefits (NRS 616D.300), meaning a person lied about his ability to pay back the marker because he knew he did not have enough cash, credit or collateral to cover it;

- Forgery (NRS 205.090), defined as using counterfeit records with the intent to defraud (charges of identity theft and misrepresentation of assets sometimes accompany a forgery charge);

- Obtaining Money by False Pretenses (NRS 205.380), or convincing someone to loan money based on trickery, such as forgery or making false statements;

- Crime of Bad Checks (NRS 205.130), which is defined as willfully passing a check with the knowledge that the account contains insufficient funds to cover the amount; and

- Theft (NRS 205.0832), which covers a broad range of actions that includes passing a check while knowing that funds are not sufficient to cover it.

All five offenses carry varying degrees of possible penalties upon conviction, including time in jail or state prison, fines and restitution.

"The D.A. is basically the casino's debt collector," stated Michael Becker, a Nevada criminal defense attorney. "Instead of hiring their own lawyers, casinos exploit public resources to recover private funds."

"In our opinion, there's an inherent conflict of interest in the whole system because the state has an added incentive to prosecute. The more you allegedly owe to a casino, the more the D.A. makes in collection fees," he added.

"The bad check unit of Las Vegas' Clark County District Attorney's Office functions as a collection agency for the casinos," agreed Adam Resnik, a former felon with a pathological gambling addiction and an expert on the subject.

Another issue is the "presumption of guilt" which critics say is built into state law. In order to secure a conviction, prosecutors need only prove that a gambler willfully took out a casino marker while having insufficient funds in his or her bank account to pay it. The law automatically presumes intent to defraud if there were insufficient funds in the bank when the casinos try to redeem the markers.

"Nevada casino marker law is very biased towards the casinos," said Henderson, Nevada criminal defense attorney Neil Shouse. "If your bank account overdrafts, the law basically says you're guilty until proven innocent."

"We don't put people in jail for failing to pay debts," countered Chief D.A. Zadrowski. "We put people in jail for committing crimes, and that's what this case [against Zahavi] was all about."

Of course, those crimes are for failing to pay debts to casinos, making the D.A.'s counter-argument somewhat counter-intuitive. ■

Ninth Circuit Affirms Preliminary Injunction in Challenge to California's CASE Act

ON NOVEMBER 7, 2012, A FEDERAL judge granted a temporary restraining order (TRO) enjoining the implementation of parts of the Californians Against Sexual Exploitation Act ("CASE Act"), passed by voters as Proposition 35, which requires registered sex offenders (RSOs) to provide identifying information about their online accounts to the government.

In seeking the TRO on behalf of all RSOs, the ACLU of Northern California and Electronic Frontier Foundation argued that the CASE Act's provisions requiring RSOs to provide the police with a list of their Internet providers and screen names violated their rights to free speech and association under the First Amendment, as well as their due process and equal protection rights.

U.S. District Court Judge Thelton Henderson concluded there were "serious questions" about whether the challenged sections of the CASE Act violated RSOs' First Amendment and other constitutional rights. He also found that, insofar as the state indicated it would be unable to enforce the new law until March 2013, there would be minimal harm in issuing a TRO.

Noting that RSOs would suffer the potential loss of their ability to speak anonymously on the Internet, that such a loss of First Amendment freedoms "unquestionably constitutes irreparable injury" and that there is a significant public interest in upholding free speech principles, as well as in preventing violation of a party's constitutional rights, Henderson held the standards for issuing a TRO had been satisfied.

In January 2013, the district court also granted the plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary injunction, enjoining the state's enforcement of the CASE Act. "The Court does not lightly take the step of enjoining a state statute, even on a preliminary basis. However, just as the Court is mindful that a strong majority of California voters approved Proposition 35 and that the government has a legitimate interest in protecting individuals from online sex offenses and human trafficking, it is equally mindful that '[a]nonymity is a shield from the tyranny of the majority,' and that Plaintiffs enjoy no lesser right to anonymous speech simply because they are 'unpopular.'"

The state appealed the preliminary injunction order to the Ninth Circuit on February 11, 2013, and the case was stayed pending the outcome of the appeal. See: Doe v. Harris, U.S.D.C. (N.D. Cal.), Case No. 3:12-cv-05713-TEH.

On November 18, 2014, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the district court's order granting the preliminary injunction, finding it had not abused its discretion. Specifically, the appellate court determined the lower court had properly considered the standards for issuing the injunction and concluded, "as did the district court, that Appellees are likely to succeed on the merits of their First Amendment challenge." See: Doe v. Harris, 2014 U.S. App. LEXIS 21808 (9th Cir. Nov. 18, 2014). ■

Education is Better than Punishment: Something We Can All Support!

by Vivian D. Nixon

LEARNED IN THE HARSHTEST WAY POSSIBLE that in the United States of America, every felony conviction, no matter what the judge officially assigns in months or years, quite literally results in a life sentence. As a strong proponent of decarceration, I am encouraged by efforts toward sentencing reform which will get some people out of prison sooner. But I am painfully aware that release from prison will present new challenges for those individuals whose futures have been made permanently fragile by their status as convicted criminals.

The lifetime consequences of a criminal conviction are evident in the diminished social status and in the devastation of poor communities and communities of color that have been hyper-policed, hyper-prosecuted and hyper-punished for decades. Individuals from these communities are punished not only by virtue of the time they actually spend in prison, on probation or in an alternative program, but because of the additional punishments that are inflicted for a lifetime. The consequences of a felony conviction include periods of voter disenfranchisement that vary state by state, travel restrictions, restricted access to public housing, restrictions on federal educational benefits, barriers to certifications and licensure for certain professions, and an irreversible stigma that permeates every aspect of life.

For those who spend time in prison, release is stressful under the best of circumstances. People are released with a small stipend that barely covers the cost of living for a day or two. Without adequate assistance, many understandably fail to find meaningful employment, build relationships and integrate successfully into a community. Having been released to a militaristic system of supervision that provides few services, imposes conditions that almost guarantee failure and often expects failure, many parolees return to prison. Those who manage to successfully stay out remain stigmatized by the requirement that they continue to identify themselves on legal documents, job applications, school applications and in numerous other places as a person who has a criminal conviction, no matter how long ago the original crime occurred. These types of punitive responses to people who have made serious mistakes but have already repaid their debts to society do nothing to solve the problems, like unemployment, that lead to crime, and hinder rather than promote rehabilitation and successful integration into the community.

It is difficult to understand why there would be any policy in place that would make it more difficult for people to come home from prison and do the right thing. I'm assuming the perspective of the mainstream in that doing the right thing means, at the very least, becoming self-supporting and living within the boundaries of the law. It has been argued that many of the barriers that are in place to restrict convicted people from certain jobs, from public housing, etc., are there to protect the public. However, the stronger arguments demonstrate that such barriers are purely punitive. Furthermore, in being punitive to individuals, we are actually causing further damage to our larger society. Unsurprisingly, there is now strong evidence to show that by failing to provide convicted individuals with the tools needed to succeed once they leave the criminal justice system, growing incarceration has significantly increased poverty in our nation.

Among the most absurd punitive policies making it difficult to succeed after conviction are policies that restrict access to higher education. I say absurd because, at this point, even those on the most conservative side of the public dialogue about prison reform agree that "Prisoners should be provided free education in order to reduce crime and recidivism." This is a direct quote that former Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich made during a meeting of Right on Crime in Washington, D.C. last spring.

At the same time that living-wage employment has required higher skill levels, education – particularly higher education – has increasingly become the most under-appreciated, underused and under-supported tool offered inside correctional facilities. This has happened despite the numerous studies proving that education is the most reliable predictor of reduced criminal recidivism. Educational attainment, besides being a worthy goal in itself, also increases one's prospects for securing meaningful employment, enabling individuals to support themselves and their families. While nationwide 43.3% of formerly incarcerated individuals are likely to return to prison within three years of release, the likelihood drops to 5.6% for Bachelor's degree recipients and less than 1% for Master's degree recipients.

Despite this data the growing trend is to create post-conviction barriers for individuals who are attempting to apply to college. The Center for Community Alternatives found that nearly sixty percent of colleges and universities nationwide screen students for criminal records during the application process. In some cases, applicants are asked whether they've ever been arrested – even if the arrest did not lead to a conviction. Institutions that request this information often do so without appreciation for the complexities of criminal records and with no thoughtful process for evaluating the impact a criminal record may or may not have on a particular student's ability to successfully engage in the educational process.

For incarcerated individuals who desire to access higher learning opportunities, yet another barrier exists: they are ineligible for federal Pell Grants. Established by the late Senator Claiborne Pell, the grants allowed people – including those inside correctional facilities – who could not afford college to access postsecondary education. Incarcerated students were made ineligible for Pell Grants in 1994 under the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act, a contradiction of Senator Pell's legacy of helping ensure that everyone could attend college. After eligibility was removed, the number of higher education programs in prisons dropped from 350 to 8, nationwide.

For more than 40 years, the goal of the Pell Grant program has been to provide need-based assistance to students to promote access to higher education. Funding flows directly to the educational institution, and eligibility for aid is based on student need and expected family contributions. Pell Grants are available to anyone who qualifies; thus, removing the barrier to eligibility for incarcerated persons does not diminish the opportunity of any other eligible student to receive financial aid. It simply ensures that all qualified low-income students who are motivated to pursue higher education have equal access to aid.

Thousands of clear, concise definitions.
See page 61 for ordering information.

As a formerly incarcerated woman of color, my incarceration does not define me but it did provide an opportunity for me to live a life that matters. I always knew that prison had changed me forever, but I wasn't sure exactly how it had changed me until I returned to the Albion Correctional Facility as an invited guest to speak to the women about education. Returning reminded me that I had found meaning as a tutor in the Adult Basic Education class there, and that's where I realized that once caught up in the cycle without education it is almost impossible to get out. I vowed then to complete college when I got out and I've been working to make sure others have the opportunity to do the same.

When my visit was over it was count time. I noticed the deadly silence that descends when there is no movement in the prison; I felt out of place. Then I remembered that "out of place" is indeed a punishable charge for "inmates." The fear that had been eternally etched into my spirit was re-ignited. The sense of foreboding traveled with me as I cleared the gate and returned to a society in which I am forever "out of place."

People with criminal convictions live among us daily. It is up to us to decide how best to create systems and policies that promote public safety. Making it difficult for people to access opportunity and contribute to society is contrary to that goal, and contrary to the economic health of our country.

The Education from the Inside Out Coalition supports policy change to eliminate the 1994 ban on Pell Grant eligibility for incarcerated persons and re-establish the opportunity for otherwise eligible people in prison to obtain college financial aid through Pell Grants for postsecondary education programs. We also work to eliminate discriminatory practices for people with convictions who are applying to colleges on the outside. # Reenergized D.C. Corrections Information Council Targets Jail and Prison Conditions

by Derek Gilna

THE NUMBER OF SUICIDES AT THE District of Columbia Jail was cited as the top concern of an independent agency whose mission is to monitor conditions for thousands of incarcerated D.C. offenders housed in the District's jail system and in federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) facilities across the nation.

While the District of Columbia operates its own jails, including the Central Detention Facility and Correctional Treatment Facility, the latter managed by Corrections Corporation of America, D.C. offenders sentenced to prison terms are transferred to BOP facilities.

To address its primary concern, the annual report of the D.C. Corrections Information Council (CIC) for fiscal year 2013 recommended that the District's Department of Corrections (DOC) develop "new training and protocol" to deal with jail suicides.

The report noted "there have been four suicides at the D.C. Jail since November 2012 and 165 suicide attempts in the past two years," prompting a "study by a nationally-recognized expert in the subject" and the formation of a special task force to investigate the issue. Task force members testified as to their findings at a City Council hearing.

The annual report stated that "correctional mental health experts and community members familiar with the issue testified at this hearing before the City Council. The CIC recommends the D.C. DOC take their testimony into account when developing new training and protocol in this area."

The CIC also reported receiving "numerous and ongoing reports of poor conditions of confinement" at the high-security United States Penitentiary McCreary in Pine Knot, Kentucky. The agency said prisoners had cited "slow or non-existent medical care; racist and abusive staff; retaliatory practices by staff including pepper spray, paper sheets, and other punitive measures," as well as problems computing the proper length of prisoners' sentences.

The CIC expressed optimism that the new warden assigned to USP McCreary, J.C. Holland, would take steps to correct the problems.

The report further stated that "the CIC met or exceeded" the four primary goals it had established for itself in 2013, including inspecting prison facilities, meeting with more than one-fourth of all D.C. prisoners in BOP custody, holding or attending at least a dozen community outreach meetings and conducting three expert training sessions.

Following a seven-year hiatus, the CIC re-emerged in mid-2012 after D.C. Mayor Vincent C. Gray and the City Council responded to requests from prisoners' rights advocates to appoint new board members to the agency.

The CIC's mission is "to inspect the prisons, jails, and residential reentry centers where D.C. residents are incarcerated in order to ensure compliance with constitutional, human rights, statutory, and institutional standards that govern the operation of these facilities."

In its public mission statement, the agency notes that "independent prison monitoring, as opposed to government or industry oversight, ensures accurate, unbiased information about the status of specific prisons, jails and halfway houses as well as the system as a whole. This type of oversight provides staff and inmates with the knowledge that an independent body is observing and reporting on the conditions" of their confinement.

The task is not always an easy one. The CIC's annual report noted that "during fiscal year 2013, there were 5,697 District of Columbia residents in 113 BOP facilities in 34 states," many incarcerated "far from their government, homes, and families."

These offenders, some of whom are housed as far away as California, "face unique obstacles in maintaining community connections and in reentering the community upon completion of their sentences," the report stated. "The CIC's oversight role also includes reporting on these unique obstacles and making recommendations to remove barriers to reentry." Additionally, the agency monitors conditions for around 2,270 prisoners in the D.C. jail system.

The CIC was largely inactive following its creation as part of the National Capital Revitalization and Self-Government Improvement Act of 1997. Since 2012, board members and staff have been on a steep learning curve, meeting with corrections officials, prisoner advocates and BOP officials to not only establish better communication but also to review policies and procedures. Towards that end the agency has engaged in extensive outreach to learn the community's concerns about the welfare of D.C. prisoners, among other administrative goals.

During fiscal year 2013, the CIC reported that it "conducted eight facility inspections and inspected video visitation at the D.C. Jail," in addition to a tour of the high-security United States Penitentiary Beaumont in Texas. "These inspections and tours reached all D.C. DOC inmates, and 1,443 residents in [BOP] custody – more than a quarter of all residents incarcerated outside the District."

The 2013 inspections came on the heels of the panel's efforts during the previous year, when the CIC and its staff toured the District of Columbia jails, the United States Penitentiary Hazelton and Secure Female Facility in West Virginia, and the Federal Correctional Institution in Cumberland, Maryland.

While visiting the facilities, they listened to the first-hand comments of D.C. men and women confined in those institutions, who voiced concerns about treatment by staff, inadequate or indifferent medical care, little or no contact with loved ones, limited visitation, the high cost of making phone calls home and a lack of nutritious food.

The CIC's three board members include Rev. Samuel Whittaker, a pastor and member of Mayor Gray's 2011 Faith Based Transition team, who has experience counseling former offenders; Katherine A. Huffman, who began her legal career as a civil rights litigator in Atlanta, focusing on prison and jail conditions in the Southeast; and Cara M. Compani, an attorney whose "interest in conditions of confinement and reentry began while working with juveniles" in upstate New York.

D.C. prisoners can contact the CIC at this address: D.C. Corrections Information Council, Wilson Building, 1350 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW #533, Washington, DC 20004; (202) 478-9211. ■

Agreement to Limit Solitary Confinement in New York State Prisons Applauded

CIVIL RIGHTS GROUPS AND NEW YORK State officials are hailing as “historic” an agreement to enact sweeping reforms in the way the state’s prison system uses solitary confinement as a means of punishing prisoners.

Under the unprecedented February 2014 agreement between the New York Civil Liberties Union (NYCLU) and New York State Department of Corrections and Community Supervision (DOCCS), the state agreed to immediately begin to remove pregnant and mentally disabled prisoners from segregation.

The agreement, which suspends a class-action lawsuit, also makes New York’s prison system the largest in the nation to ban the use of solitary confinement to punish offenders under the age of 18.

“These changes, while just a first step, are significant,” noted NYCLU executive director Donna Lieberman. “They’re historic. We’re the largest system in the country to preclude solitary confinement for juvenile prisoners. That’s huge.”

Echoing Lieberman’s remarks, DOCCS Acting Commissioner Anthony J. Annucci said the changes would “make the disciplinary practices in New York’s prisons more humane.”

“New York State has done the right thing by committing to comprehensive reform of the way it uses extreme isolation, a harmful and inhumane practice that has for years been used as a punishment of first resort in New York’s prisons,” Lieberman observed. “By entering into this agreement, [Governor Andrew Cuomo’s] administration has shown that it has the vision to transform New York into a national leader in the movement toward alternatives to solitary confinement, and has prioritized the safety of prisoners, prison staff and New York’s communities.”

Under the agreement the state will adopt disciplinary sentencing guidelines, and will set first-ever maximum limits on the length of time served in solitary confinement. In return, the NYCLU agreed to suspend its class-action suit against the state for two years. If reforms do not move forward by then, the suit will resume.

“We agreed to suspend our lawsuit because the State demonstrated in the course of these negotiations a real commitment to reform,” said NYCLU senior staff attorney Taylor Pendergrass, lead counsel in the case. “This will not only be a tremendous accomplishment for the State of New York and DOCCS, but will also signal a critical reorientation of the system toward practices that emphasize treatment and rehabilitation over punishment and isolation.”

As part of the agreement, DOCCS will also increase the number of hours of recreation and expand access to radios and educational materials for prisoners in segregation. Previously, prisoners held in solitary confinement were allowed only one hour of recreation per day and denied access to educational materials.

“This agreement is an important step toward dignity and decency,” said lead plaintiff Leroy Peoples, who served 780 consecutive days in solitary for nonviolent behavior. “I thank the governor for taking this seriously and hearing us out.”

“Hopefully, this agreement can stop the prison system from failing our communities,” added plaintiff Dwayne Richardson, who was sentenced to 1,095 days in segregation, also for nonviolent behavior. “This agreement has the potential to change DOCCS’s focus to treatment, not just punishment, so some good will come of our time in prison.”

The agreement resulted from the NYCLU’s class-action lawsuit, Peoples v. Fischer, U.S.D.C. (S.D.N.Y.), Case No. 1:11-cv-02694-SAS, which challenged New York’s use of solitary confinement. An October 2012 NYCLU report, “Boxed In: The True Cost of Extreme Isolation in New York’s Prisons,” revealed that DOCCS routinely sentenced prisoners to weeks and even years of solitary for the most minor of infractions.

“New York is taking a substantial step in the right direction, and we hope that it will ultimately join the many other states who have recognized that lengthy isolation sentences cause serious harm while accomplishing little if any of the goals of a rational corrections system,” said Professor Alexander Reinert, with the Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law.

“With so little to do, your mind rots with thoughts that are uncommon or unnatural,” wrote Daniel, a 52-year-old

DOCCS prisoner at the Upstate Correctional Facility, in a letter to the NYCLU about his experiences in SHUs (“Special Housing Units,” the term DOCCS uses for solitary confinement).

Daniel, who has a history of self-mutilation, wrote that his time in “the Box,” as prisoners refer to the SHU, made him “become numb” and “lose the sense of reality to the degree that any commotion at all is better than vegetating by letting hours pass [with] nothing on your mind or [the] will to do anything.”

Letters like Daniel’s were the centerpiece of the NYCLU report, which was the culmination of a year-long investigation that included interviews with prison guards, mental health professionals, and SHU prisoners and their families and attorneys. The NYCLU also reviewed thousands of pages of DOCCS regulations and disciplinary records, statistical information regarding the prison system’s use of isolation, and prisoners’ disciplinary and mental health histories, as well as more than 100 letters from SHU prisoners.

The investigation found almost 4,500 prisoners were held in “the Box” throughout the prison system every day, including nearly 2,000 at two facilities where the NYCLU concentrated its investigation: Upstate, near the Canadian border, and the Southport Correctional Facility in Pine City, New York.

Prisoners in segregation are kept inside a cell about the size of a bathroom for 23 hours each day, with the remaining hour for outside exercise in a segregated cage known as a “kennel.” Meals are delivered through a slot in the door. And every year, according to the NYCLU, about 2,000 prisoners “are released directly from the SHU back to the community.”

What the NYCLU found especially egregious about “the Box” was how so many DOCCS prisoners were placed there for such long periods of time. According to the report, between 2007 and 2011, prisoners were put in solitary confinement more than 75,000 times for an average of 150 days – what experts said was five to 10 times longer than the maximum tolerable length – with some prisoners serving SHU terms of years or even decades.

The report found that roughly 90% of those placements served as punishment for alleged disciplinary violations of more than 100 institutional rules – everything from personal grooming and personal property to fighting.

According to DOCCS regulations, guards are discouraged from submitting misbehavior reports for “minor infractions” or other violations that “do not involve danger to life, health, security or property.” But once a guard submits a disciplinary charge, prison officials have far too much discretion, the NYCLU argued, in determining whether the violation merits solitary.

In addition, once a misbehavior report reaches a disciplinary hearing, hearing officers – who are DOCCS employees – usually favor a guard’s testimony over a prisoner’s.

“My story was credible. I appealed [to DOCCS headquarters in] Albany,” wrote Donell, an Upstate prisoner who, like Daniel and others, was given a pseudonym by the NYCLU to avoid retaliation by prison officials. “You can never beat a ticket. The disciplinary hearings are unfair... [T]he hearing officers are friends with the [guards].”

The NYCLU’s research corroborated Donell’s claim. From 2007 to 2011, approximately 95% of the more than 105,000 disciplinary hearings held by DOCCS for Tier III violations – those reserved “for the most serious offenses, such as assaults on staff or other inmates” – resulted in a conviction and time in “the Box.” Moreover, the NYCLU learned, prisoners were often found guilty “based solely on the misbehavior report and the [guard’s] testimony while dismissing conflicting prisoner testimony.”

“We are incarcerated for a crime. We are in here repaying that [debt],” wrote Adrian, a Southport SHU prisoner. “We shouldn’t be punished in here with unfairness.”

Donn Rowe, who until recently headed the union representing New York’s state prison guards, would not comment on the agreement between NYCLU and DOCCS, but when the civil rights suit was filed in 2012, Rowe submitted an editorial to the New York Post in which he described solitary confinement as being critical for ensuring “stability and safety” in state prisons.

The former commissioner of New York City’s corrections system, Martin Horn, agreed that reforms are needed to curtail the use of solitary, but said he worried the agreement will strip guards of an important tool used to maintain order.

“Some segregation will always be necessary in a prison system like New York’s, for safety reasons,” stated Horn, currently a professor at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice. “As programs and activities have been stripped as a result of budget cuts, all that is left is idle inmates,” he added. “And idle inmates make problems.”

Horn said he hoped that New York State will continue to develop and fund reform programs such as those championed by Governor Cuomo, including new education and training programs that can provide incentives in lieu of punishments like solitary confinement. ■

When Attorneys Fumble, Defendants Face Consequences

by David M. Reutter

THE RIGHT OF DEFENDANTS FACING criminal charges to be represented by counsel is the bedrock of our criminal justice system, expressly enshrined in the Sixth Amendment.

An underlying doctrine to that right holds that counsel becomes an agent of the client, binding the client to the actions and inactions of their attorney. In cases where counsel acts negligently, the client is often unable to pursue or is denied relief—though one federal circuit court judge has stated that such an outcome in capital cases is “unjust and inequitable.”

After the U.S. Supreme Court held in 1963 in Gideon v. Wainwright that every criminal defendant has the right to representation by counsel, states created public defender offices or other means of indigent defense. The right to counsel has extended, thus far, to representation at trial and on direct appeal. Recently, the Supreme Court held that cause to overcome the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act (AEDPA) may be established when a claim of ineffective assistance of trial counsel must be raised on collateral review and counsel was not provided for that purpose. See: Martinez v. Ryan, 132 S.Ct. 1309 (2012) [PLN, Nov. 2013, p.12].

Currently, most criminal defendants are left on their own to navigate and litigate in the difficult post-conviction arena, which typically encompasses habeas corpus petitions. Death row prisoners, however, often receive appointed counsel or are approached by groups willing to assist them due to the fact of their death sentences.

Unlike in most states, prisoners on death row in Alabama are not guaranteed appointment of counsel in post-conviction proceedings. As a result, as noted by Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, “On occasion, some prisoners sentenced to death receive no post-conviction representation at all.”

After Alabama death row prisoner Ronald B. Smith, Jr.’s direct appeal was affirmed by the Alabama Court of Criminal Appeals and Alabama Supreme Court, he was contacted by the Equal Justice Initiative (EJI), a Montgomery-based nonprofit law firm that represents poor people and prisoners. The March 8, 2001 letter from EJI informed Smith that volunteer attorneys and law students were preparing a state post-conviction petition on his behalf. EJI’s caseload was too heavy to represent him, but the organization was seeking counsel and would send him the petition to file pro se if that effort failed.

EJI was able to convince Tennessee attorney William Massey to represent Smith in July 2001. Because Massey was not admitted to practice in Alabama, he recruited Alabama attorney C. Wade Johnson to act as local counsel. With Smith’s time limit under the AEDPA set to expire on October 2, 2001, his petition was filed on September 27.

Although it was unclear which attorney filed the petition, it was clear the petition was filed without the required $154 fee or a motion to proceed in forma pauperis. The clerk returned the petition on October 15, and it was not refiled until February 6, 2002. That filing occurred only after a state attorney called Johnson’s office to advise that Smith’s state limitations period was about to expire.

The petition was denied and eventually became final on July 15, 2005. Four days later, Smith filed a federal habeas petition. The Alabama federal district court dismissed the petition because it was not filed within the one-year statute of limitations required by AEDPA. The Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed on December 28, 2012, holding that neither statutory nor equitable tolling applied.

The appellate court’s majority opinion and Judge Rosemary Barkett’s dissent reveal the problem with the doctrine that makes a client accountable for the actions and inactions of their attorney: In most cases, prisoners have no control or supervision over the work or conduct of their lawyer. Rather, they must trust the attorney is protecting their rights and acting in their best interests. Also, prisoners represented by counsel generally cannot file pro se pleadings in court in an effort to protect their own rights.

In some cases, the trust that prisoners must put in their attorneys is sadly misplaced. For example, Corey Maples, another Alabama death row prisoner, received legal assistance from the New York firm of Sullivan & Cromwell, one of the most prestigious law firms in the country.

“I have little doubt that the vast majority of criminal defendants would think that they had won the lottery if they were given the opportunity to be represented by attorneys from such a firm,” Supreme Court Justice Samuel A. Alito, Jr. wrote of Sullivan & Cromwell in a concurrence in Maples’ appeal.

Maples’ attorneys completely missed the court filing deadline in his case after leaving the firm and effectively abandoning him. On appeal, the Supreme Court found cause to excuse the missed deadline and remanded the case for further proceedings. See: Maples v. Thomas, 132 S.Ct. 912 (2012).

But the conduct of Ronald Smith’s attorney, C. Wade Johnson, was far more egregious.

“From the beginning of his so-called representation of Smith, Johnson was on probation for a public intoxication conviction and was actively abusing prescription drugs and crystal methamphetamine,” wrote Eleventh Circuit Judge Barkett. A sworn affidavit from Johnson’s legal assistant said he would often arrive at the office intoxicated and sometimes had to be retrieved from his home to attend court hearings.

Within months of taking Smith's case, Johnson was charged with nine counts of possession of a controlled substance. The Alabama State Bar placed him on disability inactive status and appointed a trustee to take over his cases. Johnson subsequently filed for bankruptcy, then committed suicide in August 2002.

Massey, Smith's other attorney, never sought pro hac vice status, which made any filings he could have submitted to the court a "nullity" under Alabama law, since he wasn't licensed to practice in that state. Yet the Eleventh Circuit majority held Smith had not been abandoned by counsel and was bound by the actions and inactions of Johnson and Massey.

Judge Barkett noted that "neither Massey nor Johnson ever meaningfully functioned as Smith's attorneys." She questioned the established doctrine of blaming clients for the mistakes of their counsel, and reaffirmed that notion in Smith's case.

"I believe it is unjust and unequitable to require death row inmates to suffer the consequences of their attorneys' negligence by denying them equitable tolling," she stated. For that matter, it is unjust and unequitable for prisoners not sentenced to death, too.

Cases such as Smith's and Maples' call into question the real meaning of effective representation by counsel. It appears that so long as an attorney has entered a notice of appearance, courts accept that a defendant is receiving adequate representation. In one Texas case, the attorney was physically but not mentally present.

That case involved an attorney who was asleep as testimony and evidence was presented to prove his client's guilt during a capital murder trial. [See: PLN, Dec. 1994, p.14]. On appeal, the Fifth Circuit held the defendant could not establish ineffective assistance because it could not be shown that he was prejudiced by his attorney napping during what is presumed to be the most important stage of any criminal case – the trial. The appellate court concluded that defendants do not have an absolute right to an attorney who stays awake. See: Burdine v. Johnson, 231 F.3d 950 (5th Cir. 2000).

At least in that case, the ruling was reversed by the en banc Court of Appeals and the defendant's conviction was reversed. Following remand he accepted a plea deal for three life sentences, avoiding the death penalty. See: Burdine v. Johnson, 262 F.3d 336, 338 (5th Cir. 2001) (en banc), cert. denied.

Each of these cases may seem insignificant to those who are not at the blunt end of the criminal justice system, but when the damage as a whole is considered, the erosion of constitutional guarantees such as effective representation by counsel threatens not only basic human rights but shakes the foundation of the democracy upon which our nation is based.

The U.S. Supreme Court denied certiorari review in Smith's case on November 4, 2013, affirming the Eleventh Circuit's finding that his attorneys' failure to timely file his post-conviction petition meant he was simply out of luck. Smith remains on Alabama's death row. See: Smith v. Commissioner, Alabama Department of Corrections, 703 F.3d 1266 (11th Cir. 2012), cert. denied. ■

Audit Finds Significant Increase in Fraudulent Tax Returns Filed by Prisoners

PRISONERS ARE FILING PHONY FEDERAL income tax returns in record numbers and the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) continues to pay refunds despite repeated warnings from the Treasury Inspector General for Tax Administration.

Inspector General J. Russell George told a U.S. House oversight subcommittee on February 26, 2014 that according to the IRS, the number of fraudulent tax returns filed with a Social Security Number assigned to a prisoner had skyrocketed from around 18,000 in 2004 to more than 186,000 in 2011.

"The refunds claimed on these tax returns increased from $68 million to $3.7 billion," George testified.

"Refund fraud associated with the use of Social Security Numbers of and by prisoners to file false tax returns remains a significant problem for tax administration," he stressed.

The increase in fraudulent tax returns occurred despite repeated warnings to the IRS to be alert to the problem of phony returns filed by prisoners, and despite several changes to federal law to make it easier for authorities to detect them.

The 2011 figures were more than double the previous year, when prisoners filed 91,000 fraudulent income tax returns claiming refunds totaling $757 million.

Further, in 2010, nearly 1,300 prisoners improperly received more than $9 million in home-buyer tax credits, according to the Inspector General. [See: PLN, Feb. 2011, p.18].

Dwayne Selvey, an Ohio state prisoner who explained in detail to a Congressional committee in 2005 how he had defrauded the IRS of nearly $4 million in phony tax refunds, said it was not difficult at all.

"It was about one of the easiest things I've ever done in my life," Selvey told Cleveland's ABC News Channel 5 in an April 2014 news report. "When I first started off, I didn't use a W-2 form, I just used a piece of paper and wrote down like I was the owner of the company."

Selvey said he bought "two Cadillac Escalades, a couple of lake homes and expensive clothes" with the money, which he squirreled away in multiple bank accounts and accessed after he was released. He was later jailed on a parole violation and returned to prison.

"I'm not sure why I got away with it for as long as I did," he stated.

The television station also reported that two other Ohio prisoners serving time for murder, Michael Murdock and Ronald Dean Wells, had claimed more than $139,000 in fraudulent tax refunds.

"They just made up an amount of purported withholding and said, hey, IRS – give me back that withholding you took out," said Assistant U.S. Attorney John M. Siegel.

Another prisoner, Brandon Mace, was sentenced to over six years in federal prison in May 2013 after filing fraudulent tax refund claims over a two-year period.

"He had it timed so he could pick it up after he got out of prison, but by the time he got there, the post office had sent the $207,000 check back to the IRS," Siegel said.

In Minnesota, two prisoners face federal charges of conspiracy and filing false claims stemming from a tax fraud scheme they allegedly ran from prison. A federal indictment handed down in August 2014 alleges that Tanka James Tetzlaff, 39, and Tony Terrell Robinson, 30, were behind the scam, collecting more than $400,000 in fraudulent refunds by using the names and Social Security Numbers of fellow prisoners.

"The defendants prepared and filed the tax returns, or arranged for them to be prepared and filed, knowing they were false," according to the indictment.

George told the Congressional subcommittee that the Inspector General had warned as early as December 2010 that "significant problems exist with the IRS's efforts to identify the use of Social Security Numbers of and by prisoners to file false tax returns to commit tax refund fraud," noting that legislation passed in 2008 and again in 2010 gave the IRS the authority to disclose prisoner tax information to the Bureau of Prisons and state Departments of Corrections.

"However, as of October 2010, the IRS had not completed the necessary agreements to share prisoner information," George testified. "As a result, no information had been disclosed to either the Federal Bureau of Prisons or state Departments of Corrections at that time."

In January 2013, the American Taxpayer Relief Act gave the IRS permanent authority to share information with the Bureau of Prisons and state prison officials; however, no agreements were in place by January 2014.

George also faulted the IRS's process for reviewing and compiling prisoner data, saying the agency "lacked managerial oversight to ensure ... accuracy and reliability" of the prisoner data file. He called the omission "critical" because the file is used to flag phony tax returns before any refunds are issued.

As recently as December 2012, George said, the Inspector General warned that "despite increased efforts by the IRS to improve the accuracy of the Prisoner File, there were inaccuracies in the prisoner information, the file contained incomplete records, and not all prisons reported [data on] prisoners. As such, the controls used to ensure that the IRS identifies fraudulent refunds on tax returns prepared by prisoners were not fully effective."

George conceded that "most of these issues we identified are beyond the control of the IRS because the IRS has to rely on information provided by the prisons to identify prisoner-filed tax returns.”

For example, in 2012, after the IRS informed prison officials of missing data or errors, only “ten of the 52 prison systems [including the Bureau of Prisons and District of Columbia] provided corrected data to the IRS,” according to an Inspector General’s audit released on December 18, 2012.

“We are committed to maintaining good working relationships with the correctional agencies and ensuring they understand our need for accurate data,” wrote Peggy Bogadi, head of the IRS’s Wage and Investment Division. “We believe these efforts will continue to improve the accuracy and reliability” of the agency’s prisoner data file.

George testified that “the IRS can do more to ensure that the Prisoner File is accurate and complete by taking further steps to improve its validation and verification processes.”

In spite of its focus on tax fraud, the 2012 Inspector General’s audit noted that many prisoners have a legitimate reason to file tax returns and obtain refunds, especially if they are newly incarcerated or have investment income. The audit recognized, for example, that the IRS issued $35.2 million in legitimate tax refunds to prisoners in 2010.

Further, tax fraud by prisoners represents only one of numerous problems facing the nation’s tax collection system. The Rasmussen College School of Business found, for example, that total estimated losses due to corporate tax evasion in 2009 were $29.3 billion, based on the estimated 84% compliance rate for individual filers.

And Citizens for Tax Justice (CTJ) reported in a 2011 study that 30 major corporations, including General Electric, Boeing, Verizon and Mattel, realized profits exceeding $205 billion from 2008 to 2011, yet paid no federal income tax between 2008 and 2010. One year later, 26 of those companies – including online retailer Amazon, which made billions in 2011 sales – had still paid no federal income tax, CTJ found.

If those companies had “paid the full 35 percent corporate tax rate over the 2008–11 period,” the organization reported, “they would have paid $78.3 billion more in federal income taxes.”

Which indicates that the real criminals committing tax fraud can be found in corporate boardrooms, not among prisoners. ■

Texas Prison Population Drops as Guard Shortage Persists

by Matt Clarke

IN SPITE OF A THREE-YEAR DOWNWARD trend, Texas continues to lead the nation with the largest state prison population. At the same time, the state has pursued a variety of incentives to address a chronic shortage of prison guards.

The population of the 109-facility Texas Department of Criminal Justice (TDCJ) fell from about 156,500 prisoners in mid-2011 to just over 154,000 in mid-2012, then to around 150,400 by November 2014 – including both TDCJ prisons and state jails. [See: PLN, Nov. 2013, p.26].

Regardless, Texas still leads the nation in terms of state prison populations because it did not reduce its population as quickly as the former leading state, California. California's prison population declined from over 160,000 to around 134,000 by diverting non-violent prisoners to county jails to comply with a federal court order to reduce the state's badly overcrowded prison system. [See: PLN, July 2011, p.1].

"It's real. It's happening, not only in Texas, but around the country," said Austin-based criminal justice consultant Tony Fabelo, who, as head of the Texas Criminal Justice Policy Council, advised state officials during the tripling of the TDCJ's prison bed capacity in the 1990s. "The challenge is to sustain the outcomes to see how far you can go in downsizing prisons. I have my doubts, but it's an interesting time for criminal justice."

The Texas Legislative Budget Board also had its doubts. In June 2012, the board released a report predicting that the drop in the state's prison population would continue only until 2014, and that by 2015 the number of prisoners could again exceed TDCJ's capacity.

Analysts trace the recent decline in Texas' prison population to the success of a variety of alternative sentencing initiatives. For example, a package of sentencing reforms passed by the state legislature in 2007 allowed defendants to be diverted from prison into rehabilitative programs. Those reforms, combined with an aging state population, a decrease in the crime rate and changes in demographics, allowed the prison population to shrink even while Texas experienced an increase in its general population.

The 2007 legislative reforms were driven by Republicans who pushed fiscal conservatism over previous tough-on-crime and lock-'em-up-and-throw-away-the-key political philosophies.

"Policies in various states are finally catching up with what we know works," stated Marc Levin, director of the Center for Effective Justice and a national leader in the Right on Crime campaign for smarter criminal justice solutions.

"For most nonviolent offenders, community-based initiatives are much cheaper and have much better outcomes," Levin said. "In this time of tight budgets and programs that work, this is the conservative thing to do."

The reforms in Texas included special courts established in large cities for cases involving drugs, veterans, drunk driving and prostitution. Courts now offer programs and intensive supervision aimed at changing defendants' lives without sending them to prison.

Concurrently, the state expanded treatment programs for prisoners and upgraded parole supervision with electronic monitoring and newly-developed risk assessment tools. According to the TDCJ's Statistical Report for fiscal year 2013, 114,225 offenders were on some type of parole or community supervision.

An emphasis on community-based probation for non-violent defendants resulted in a higher success rate for both adults and juveniles, which proved so successful that the Texas Youth Commission (now the Texas Juvenile Justice Department) was able to close half the state's juvenile facilities.

"We're definitely going to look at what works and what doesn't – and we know that treatment and rehabilitation and community justice programs work," said state Senator John Whitmire, who chairs the Senate Committee on Criminal Justice and sponsored many of the 2007 reforms.

"Prisons should be reserved for the worst of the worst, the violent criminals, murderers, child molesters we should definitely be afraid of. We have a lot of other inmates who could probably be housed someplace else, at less cost," Whitmire said.

The 2007 legislative reforms did little to benefit prisoners who were already incarcerated when the new laws were enacted, however, because they were designed to divert offenders away from prison, not release them.

But if the Texas Legislative Budget Board's prediction comes true and the number of prisoners begins to increase, the state could face an even worse shortage of guards to man its correctional facilities. To keep that from happening, state officials have offered a number of incentives to attract new recruits to shore up prison staffing levels.

A resurgent Texas economy – especially in the oil and gas industry – has led to many vacancies among guard ranks. "With energy production increasing dramatically in South and East Texas, most [prison guards] can make twice as much in the energy sector," explained Lance Lowry, head of Local 3807 of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME), which represents Texas prison guards.

"We can't compete with the private sector in these critical areas," admitted Bill Stevens, director of the TDCJ's correctional institutions division.

In January 2014, TDCJ Executive Director Brad Livingston approved increasing the recruiting bonus to $4,000 for new guards who sign one-year contracts and agree to work at one of 15 understaffed facilities located in rural areas, or in areas where jobs are available in the oil and gas industry.

"The recruitment and retention of correctional officers is a top priority for the agency," TDCJ spokesman Jason Clark wrote in an email to the Huntsville Item. "The recruitment bonus is another tool the agency is using to attract applicants to apply for positions at units that are facing staffing challenges. We understand that the correctional officer position is one of the most demanding jobs in all of state government."

The TDCJ also recruits new guards at job fairs. "It's a rewarding career to be a correctional officer," explained Earl Brown, a TDCJ representative who attended three job fairs in November 2013. "We're trying to get as many applicants as we can who are qualified."

Brown said prison guard salaries range from $2,435 to $3,250 per month, with more for applicants who hold a Bachelor's degree or have at least two years of active military service. "The salary is competitive. We have great benefits," he added.

But union president Lowry blasted Texas lawmakers for treating guards "as the ugly stepchild of the criminal justice system" when negotiating a 2013 pay hike. In a press release, Lowry faulted the legislature for granting guards a 5% raise over two years while other state law enforcement officers received 10%. He said actual take-home pay grew only slightly more than 1% in September 2013 due to an accompanying increase in the amount that TDCJ employees pay towards retirement.

The fact that many top TDCJ administrators received higher raises – ranging from 8 to 23% – did not help alleviate discontent among the prison system's rank-and-file.

Lowry also blamed lawmakers for "being unrealistic on their [sic] attempt to address chronic staffing demands now in the thousands," and said he expected staffing at TDCJ facilities "to only get worse."

As another way to reduce high turnover rates among prison guards, the TDCJ is currently making mobile home parks and dorm housing available at certain prisons that guards can rent at reduced rates, to counter the boom-town explosion in rental costs near oil and gas fields.

As of November 2014, the TDCJ had more than 3,300 vacant guard positions. ■

BOP Criticized for Denying Most Compassionate Release Requests

THE FEDERAL BUREAU OF PRISONS (BOP) is operating under revised guidelines intended to expand the circumstances under which federal prisoners can seek a reduction in their sentences through the agency's Compassionate Release Program, following two scathing reports that took the BOP to task for mismanaging the program and routinely denying early release requests.

In fact, a review by the U.S. Department of Justice's Office of the Inspector General (OIG) determined that over the six-year period from 2006 through 2011, the BOP's failure to act on such requests led to the deaths of 13% of the federal prisoners who sought compassionate release due to a terminal illness, who died in prison before their requests were decided.

Further, by refusing to petition courts on behalf of prisoners who should be considered for compassionate release, the BOP is usurping the decision-making power of judges, argued a November 2012 report co-authored by Human Rights Watch (HRW) and Families Against Mandatory Minimums (FAMM).

The revised guidelines, included in a BOP Program Statement issued on August 12, 2013, "broadens the circumstances in which the BOP will consider [compassionate release] requests," according to a statement posted on the White House's website.

The revisions cover "terminal and non-terminal medical circumstances; circumstances for elderly inmates; circumstances in which there has been the death or incapacitation of the family member caregiver of an inmate's child; and circumstances in which the spouse or registered partner of an inmate has become incapacitated." [See: PLN, May 2014, p.40].

Some prisoner advocates expressed doubt that the new guidelines will make much difference. "I don't believe it's going to change at all," said attorney Marc Seitles, who represents a prisoner denied early release despite suffering from terminal cancer. "It's still the same people making decisions."

The revised compassionate release guidelines, which officials said were implemented as part of a "Smart on Crime" initiative by the Department of Justice (DOJ), failed to address some of the recommendations contained in the OIG report and did not respond to criticisms raised by HRW and FAMM.

The BOP's Compassionate Release Program was established by the Sentencing Reform Act of 1984, which instituted determinate sentencing but also included so-called "safety valves" to allow for reductions in unjust or unfair sentences. Congress "intended the sentencing judge, not the BOP, to determine whether a prisoner should receive a sentence reduction," according to the joint HRW/FAMM report.

Under U.S. Sentencing Commission guidelines amended on November 1, 2007, judges are to consider "extraordinary and compelling" circumstances that merit a prisoner's early release, such as a terminal illness, incapacitation or the death of a prisoner's spouse that would force his or her children into foster care.

But to take advantage of the compassionate release provisions, prisoners must submit copious amounts of paperwork which must then be reviewed and approved by a string of federal bureaucrats before the request is even submitted to a judge for consideration. According to the U.S. Government Accountability Office, the BOP submits such requests "infrequently."

In fact, the OIG report found that of the approximately 214,000 federal offenders housed in BOP-operated or contracted facilities, an average of "only 24 prisoners are released each year through the BOP's compassionate release program."

"I urged more release for older, chronically ill offenders who couldn't fight their way out of a paper sack, but the [BOP] Central Office was simply not interested," retired federal prison warden Joe Bogan was quoted in the HRW/FAMM report, which included more than five dozen interviews with current and former BOP officials, federal prisoners and their family members, attorneys and advocates.

The review process under the Compassionate Release Program begins when a prisoner submits a request to the warden. According to the OIG's summary of the necessary steps, "the request must include the extraordinary and compelling circumstances that the inmate believes merit consideration; a plan for where the inmate will reside if released; and how he or she will support him- or herself if released. If the basis for the inmate's request is due to the inmate's health, information about where the inmate will receive medical care and how it will be paid for must also be included."

If the warden approves the request, it is forwarded to the BOP Regional Director; if approved at the regional level, the request is then submitted to the office of the BOP's General Counsel, which solicits opinions from BOP medical and administrative officials and from the U.S. Attorney's Office. If the review results in approval, the request moves up to the BOP Director.

If the Director approves the compassionate release request, the BOP contacts the U.S. Attorney's Office in the jurisdiction where the prisoner was sentenced; an Assistant U.S. Attorney then petitions the federal district court. The prisoner is finally released only if and when the court rules favorably on the petition.

The request can be denied at any step during the process, and prisoners have the right to appeal only if the warden or Regional Director rejects their request. The OIG report noted that a rejection by the BOP Director "constitutes a final administrative action that the inmate cannot appeal."

The "BOP has arrogated to itself discretion to decide whether a prisoner should receive a sentence reduction, even if the prisoner meets its stringent medical criteria," the HRW/FAMM report stated. "In doing so, the Bureau has usurped the role of the courts. Indeed, it is fair to say the jailers are acting as judges."

Some defense attorneys agreed. "The Bureau of Prisons should be letting judges have the opportunity to decide every time extraordinary and compelling reasons come to their attention, and [they are] not doing that," said Steve Sady, a federal public defender who represents prisoners requesting compassionate release. "We believe that, under the statute, the sentence is for the judge to decide."

The “BOP has sharply limited the grounds for compassionate release, refusing to seek a sentence reduction except when the prisoner is expected to die within a year or is profoundly and irremediably incapacitated,” the HRW/FAMM report continued. “It has not utilized the broader range of medical and non-medical circumstances that the Sentencing Commission has described as warranting consideration for compassionate release.”

Instead, “when reviewing prisoner requests for compassionate release, the BOP makes decisions based on the very factors that Congress directed the courts to consider,” noted the HRW/FAMM report. “For example, the BOP determines whether an otherwise deserving prisoner might re-offend, how a victim or the community might react to early release, and whether the prisoner has been punished enough.”

The report argued the BOP cannot make such independent and impartial determinations because the agency “is a component of the [Department of Justice], directed and supervised by the Deputy Attorney General.” And in spite of what the DOJ has acknowledged is an unsustainable $6.2 billion annual BOP budget and an expanding federal prison population, it continues to ignore even the most fundamental human rights principles.

“In recent years,” the HRW/FAMM report stated, “DOJ has taken policy positions averse to any but the most restrictive interpretation of compassionate release, favoring finality of sentences over sentence reductions for extraordinary and compelling reasons.”

The OIG report placed the blame squarely on the BOP: “We found that the existing BOP compassionate release program has been poorly managed and implemented inconsistently, likely resulting in eligible inmates not being considered for release and in terminally ill inmates dying before their requests were decided.”

The OIG also confirmed the findings in the HRW/FAMM report that the BOP improperly restricts compassionate release requests to only those prisoners with terminal medical conditions. “We ... found that although the BOP’s regulations and Program Statement permit non-medical circumstances to be considered as a basis for compassionate release, the BOP routinely rejects such requests and did not approve a single non-medical request during the 6-year period of our review.”

Even when requests are filed by prisoners who have only a short time to live, the OIG observed there were no administrative deadlines for when BOP officials must act. “Not all institutions have timeliness standards, and for those institutions that do, the time frame ranges from 5 to 65 days,” the OIG report noted.

To compound the problem, the BOP has no procedures for tracking compassionate release requests. “[T]he BOP cannot determine if requests are processed in a timely manner because the BOP does not track the time it takes to approve or deny requests,” the OIG wrote. “As a result, the BOP cannot determine if delays in the process exist, take corrective actions where delays occur, or ensure that inmates who may be eligible for the program, particularly those with terminal illnesses, are considered for release in a timely manner.”

In response to the OIG’s recommendations, BOP officials promised to correct the deficiencies cited in the report.

The HRW/FAMM report went further, recommending that the BOP “reconceptualize[] its view of compassionate release” requests so that it acts independently of the Department of Justice and fulfills the intent of the guidelines relative to such requests.

The report also recommended that, until Congress amends the Sentencing Reform Act to explicitly grant prisoners the right to petition for sentence reductions themselves, no DOJ official should “object to bringing compassionate release motions on grounds of public safety, sufficiency of punishment, or other considerations that belong within the courts’ purview.”

“Keeping a prisoner behind bars when it no longer meaningfully serves any legitimate purpose cannot be squared with human dignity and may be cruel as well as senseless,” the HRW/FAMM report concluded. ■

Washington Undersheriff Sentenced to Six Months for Stealing Bail Money

CLAIMS OF SUBSTANCE ABUSE PROBLEMS and poor physical health don't often help criminal defendants trying to mitigate their prison sentences. Carole J. Lepiane, the former undersheriff for Walla Walla County, Washington, is apparently an exception.

Lepiane, 59, who used a walker to scoot her way into a U.S. District Court on January 10, 2013, was subsequently sentenced to just six months in federal prison for embezzling more than $67,000 in cash bail posted for prisoners at the county jail. As part of a plea deal she also agreed to pay $81,271.63 in restitution – to cover both the money she stole and a county audit conducted in her criminal investigation – and must serve a year on supervised release, including four months in a residential re-entry program.

In her pre-sentence remarks to federal judge Frederick Van Sickle, Lepiane apologized to everyone except the county taxpayers and jail prisoners from whom she stole.

"I'm very sorry for any actions I took that were detrimental to my co-workers, my family or my boss, Sheriff Mike Humphreys," Lepiane said. "He did not deserve the stress, and I hope I can regain the trust of my [former] co-workers."

Lepiane served as Walla Walla County undersheriff for 10 years until July 2009, and had been dealing with some kind of substance abuse problem involving either drugs or alcohol.

According to court records, on 50 separate occasions between February 2004 and June 2009 she embezzled cash bail that was posted for Walla Walla County prisoners. The money Lepiane stole was to be deposited into the Sheriff's Office trust account.

Instead, Lepiane deposited the purloined funds into her personal bank account and reportedly used them to shop online. To conceal her crimes, she deposited into the trust account monthly checks to the Sheriff's Office from Evercom, the company that manages and profits from the jail's phone system that prisoners must use.

Judge Van Sickle told Lepiane that her actions put the Walla Walla County Sheriff's Office in a negative light and hurt its credibility; he also said her crimes were "a breach of trust." Ultimately, however, Van Sickle indicated he felt sorry for Lepiane, noting that she had mobility problems and was taking medication.

Lepiane was released from federal prison after serving her six-month sentence on December 23, 2013.

Deportations Still High Despite Decline from Record Levels

by Derek Gilna

AS POLITICAL EFFORTS TO REFORM THE nation's immigration laws continue to falter despite garnering headlines and generating contentious public debate, the latest statistics from Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) reveal that undocumented immigrants continue to be deported in large numbers.

Even though deportations fell last year from a record level in 2012, critics argue that a significant number of immigrants were "removed" for no crime other than being in the U.S. illegally – which historically has been a civil offense.

ICE officials, meanwhile, hailed the deportations as being consistent with the agency's mandate, stating "that 98 percent of removals met one or more of the agency's civil immigration enforcement priorities."

In fiscal year 2013, ICE deported 368,644 people – a 10% decline from 2012's record-setting 409,849 deportations. The agency said that of the people deported in 2013, nearly 64% were caught while, or shortly after, attempting to illegally enter the United States. The rest were apprehended in the interior of the country.

"The FY2013 numbers make clear that we are enforcing our nation's laws in a smart and effective way, meeting our enforcement priorities by focusing on convicted criminals while also continuing to secure our nation's borders," said then-ICE Acting Director John Sandweg.

ICE reported that 59% of the deportees in 2013 had been convicted of a criminal offense, "and that number rises to 82 percent for individuals removed from the interior of the U.S."

However, Immigration Impact, an advocacy project of the American Immigration Council, said the data also revealed "the extent to which immigration enforcement resources are still devoted to apprehending, detaining, and deporting individuals who represent no conceivable threat to public safety or national security."

"In fact," the group stated, "the overwhelming majority of people deported by ICE either have no prior criminal record or were convicted of misdemeanors" – usually minor offenses.

"ICE notes that 59 percent of all removals, 'a total of 216,810, had been previously convicted of a crime,'" Immigration Impact said. "That statistic leaves one to wonder about the other 41 percent – the 151,834 individuals without a prior criminal record who were also removed."

According to ICE, "other than convicted criminals, the agency's enforcement priorities include: those apprehended while attempting to unlawfully enter the United States, illegal re-entrants – individuals who returned to the U.S. after being previously removed by ICE – and immigration fugitives."

The numbers highlight the priority the federal government has placed on deporting undocumented immigrants since the 9/11 terror attacks. By way of comparison, deportations in the 1990s rarely topped 20,000 annually. Currently, more people are detained and deported each year by immigration enforcement agencies than are incarcerated in the federal Bureau of Prisons.

ICE has been the subject of criticism by immigrant-rights advocates who have complained about the agency's erratic, heavy-handed and selective enforcement that often sweeps up non-violent immigrants stopped for minor traffic violations, then holds them in prison-like facilities prior to deportation.

Nonetheless, in 2012, then-ICE

Director John Morton and Department of Homeland Security Secretary Janet Napolitano redirected ICE's resources to concentrate more on removing dangerous criminals, and issued new detainer guidelines for law enforcement agencies. The new policy focused on apprehending felons and repeat offenders, among other priorities, and applied to all ICE programs – including Secure Communities, which had been cited for abuses. [See: PLN, April 2013, p.1; March 2013, p.40; June 2011, p.43].

Immigration Impact noted that much more needs to be done. "While ICE does indeed capture and remove potentially dangerous individuals, most of its resources remain devoted to the enforcement of a broken and unworkable immigration system," the group said. "The latest decline in removals notwithstanding, the U.S. deportation machine remains severely out of balance and lacking in either flexibility or meaningful opportunities for due process." ■

D.C. Jail Guard Suicidal after Feces Thrown in Face, Sues DOC

A FORMER GUARD WITH THE DISTRICT of Columbia Department of Corrections (DOC) sued his ex-employer in November 2012, claiming he developed PTSD and suicidal tendencies after a prisoner threw feces in his face.

Guard Walter Sampson's altercation with the prisoner actually occurred in August 2006. Since then he took two years off work, underwent psychiatric treatment, returned to work and was subsequently admitted to a D.C. hospital on suicide watch.

Sampson's lawsuit claims the DOC refused "reasonable accommodation to the known physical and mental limitations" he experienced after the feces-throwing incident, in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA).

While taking two years of disability for PTSD, Sampson saw a psychiatrist weekly – and then monthly – until he was cleared to return to work in a position that excluded contact with prisoners. He returned to the DOC in September 2008, escorting contractors to their work sites.

Sampson was reassigned twice over the following three months – first to the midnight shift at DOC headquarters, then transporting prisoners to and from the D.C. jail. Two days after he began the latter assignment, on January 6, 2009, his psychiatrist declared him a danger to himself and Sampson was admitted to a hospital with suicidal tendencies the following month.

In an amended complaint filed on March 26, 2013, Sampson alleged "that the DOC denied him a reasonable accommodation in violation of the ADA by removing him from a position where he did not have contact with inmates."

He is suing for lost wages over a four-year period and compensatory damages for emotional distress.

In March 2014, the district court denied the DOC's motion to dismiss, finding service of process was timely and substituting the District of Columbia for the D.C. Department of Corrections, which lacked the capacity to be sued.

The case remains pending. See: Sampson v. DC DOC, U.S.D.C. (D. D.C.), Case No. 1:12-cv-01933-RWR. ■

Oklahoma Supreme Court Remands Consolidated Sex Offender Registration Case

by Shepherd Litsey

ON NOVEMBER 19, 2013, THE SUPREME Court of Oklahoma affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded for further proceedings a case involving a registered sex offender required to register for life due to an amended state law applied retroactively.

Christopher Luster pleaded guilty to second-degree sexual assault on April 22, 1992 in Texas and was sentenced to ten years deferred adjudication. He later moved to Oklahoma and began registering as a sex offender per Oklahoma's Sex Offender Registration Act (SORA) on September 25, 2003. Under the law at the time, he had to register for ten years. On November 1, 2007, SORA was amended and Luster was notified that his sex offender level was being increased and he would have to register for life.

Luster filed suit in 2011 to enjoin the Oklahoma Department of Corrections (DOC) from applying the amended SORA provisions, requesting removal from the registry and freedom from the registration requirement. Alternatively, he argued he should only have to register annually for ten years, with his registration term expiring in 2013. His petition led to the consolidation of 66 other cases raising similar claims.

Luster amended his petition to include all litigants with similar issues, which included three categories of plaintiffs – those with 1) convictions occurring before November 1, 1999; 2) non-aggravated convictions between November 1, 1999 and November 1, 2007; and 3) aggravated convictions between November 1, 1999 and November 1, 2007. He contended that offenders in the first two categories should have to register for no more than ten years and that the SORA amendments were not retroactive. The DOC filed a response brief insisting the legislature's intent was retroactivity.

The trial court ruled in favor of Luster on September 7, 2011, finding the amendments could not be imposed retroactively. The court listed by name the co-plaintiffs and what action the DOC was to take with each, and set the registration frequency at once per year for all who were still required to register. The DOC appealed.

The Oklahoma Supreme Court cited two recent decisions in which it had held retroactive application of sex offender registration requirements violated the ex post facto clause of the state constitution. However, the Court found problematic the trial court's imposition of a "blanket one-year registration frequency to all consolidated plaintiffs who were not immediately removed from the registry."

"For the same reasons we held the provisions of SORA in effect upon a person being convicted in Oklahoma or entering Oklahoma are the only SORA provisions that shall apply to the sex offender, we hold the frequency of SORA verification in effect at that time is also the applicable provision," the Court wrote. "The correct registration requirements to apply are those in effect when the sex offender was either convicted in Oklahoma or when a sex offender convicted in another jurisdiction enters Oklahoma and becomes subject to those registration requirements."

Accordingly, the Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's prohibition on retroactive application of the SORA amendments, reversed the trial court's blanket one-year registration frequency and remanded with instructions to review each co-plaintiff's case individually. See: Luster v. State ex rel. Dept. of Corrections, 2013 OK 97, 315 P.3d 386 (Okla. 2013). ■

Florida Court of Appeals: Prison Guards Can Raise "Stand Your Ground" Defense

by Matt Clarke

ON MARCH 28, 2014, A FLORIDA COURT of Appeals held that a former Department of Corrections guard charged with aggravated battery for assaulting a prisoner was entitled to pursue a "stand your ground" defense pursuant to § 776.032, Florida Statutes.

While employed as a guard at the Lake Correctional Institution, Brad Heilman was involved in a physical altercation with prisoner Duane Royster. Royster suffered serious injuries, including multiple facial fractures, and Heilman was fired several days after the August 27, 2011 incident.

He was subsequently charged with aggravated battery and released on $5,000 bond. He then filed a motion asking the trial court to grant a hearing and dismiss the charge based on the state's "stand your ground" statute, which provides immunity for people who use force in self-defense. The trial court denied the motion and hearing, citing State v. Caamano, 105 So.3d 18 (Fla. 2d DCA 2012). Heilman filed a petition for writ of prohibition in the Court of Appeals.

The appellate court found that Caamano did not apply. In Caamano, a police officer tried to use a "stand your ground" defense after being charged with attempted battery during the course of an arrest. The Caamano court held there were other statutes specifically preventing the prosecution of a police officer for justifiable use of force; therefore, those statutes took precedence.

There are no similar statutes that apply to prison guards. Instead, § 944.35(1)(a), located in the corrections code, specifies the situations under which a guard is authorized to use force and provides for disciplinary action, dismissal and/or criminal penalties for unauthorized use of force against prisoners. Differentiating between authorizing the use of force and justifying the use of force, the Court of Appeals held that § 944.35(1)(a) did not preclude a "stand your ground" defense for guards.

The Court therefore granted the petition, issued the writ of prohibition and remanded the case to the trial court to allow Heilman to raise a "stand your ground" defense. See: Heilman v. State, 135 So.3d 513 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 5th Dist. 2014). ■

News in Brief

Alabama: Six people, including an Alabama state prison guard and two prisoners, were arrested on April 10, 2014 for their roles in a large-scale meth operation. Phillip Burgin, 23, was employed at the Kilby Correctional Facility before being stopped in Oklahoma while transporting 30 pounds of the drug. The prisoners, Alberto Trejo and Gumaro Calles, incarcerated at two other Alabama facilities, are believed to have helped orchestrate distribution of the meth using contraband cell phones. Also arrested were Stephanie Auban, 41, William Thomas Crane II, 36, and Miguel Calles-Gutierrez. All face federal charges that carry sentences ranging from 10 years to life.

Arizona: Joseph Andrew Dekenipp, incarcerated at the Pinal County jail, escaped on February 14, 2014 for a Valentine's Day date with his sweetheart. He suffered serious cuts while climbing two walls and squeezing through razor wire, and was arrested after he arrived at a local bar and grill to meet his girlfriend. Dekenipp now faces an escape charge in addition to his initial charges of suspicion of vehicle theft, trafficking in stolen property, driving on a suspended license and unlawful flight.

Arizona: A racially-charged brawl at the Arizona State Prison Complex-Winslow left several prisoners hospitalized with non-life threatening injuries. The fight broke out on March 20, 2014 between several dozen Black and Hispanic prisoners. Guards deployed non-lethal measures to quell the disturbance and the unit was locked down. Doug Nick, communications director for the Arizona Department of Corrections, said the incident was under criminal investigation.

Australia: Smoked oysters and premium ice cream sundaes were a planned distraction for prisoners expected to suffer from nicotine withdrawal following a May 5, 2014 smoking ban at all jails and prisons in Queensland. Officials anticipated an uptick in prison violence from the mood swings associated with quitting smoking, and corrections staff were provided with specialized training to deal with the issue. Employees as well as prisoners are subject to the smoking ban.

California: U.S. Attorney Benjamin B. Wagner announced on March 27, 2014 that a contract guard at the federal Taft Correctional Institution in the San Joaquin Valley was indicted on charges related to smuggling drugs and other contraband into the MTC-operated facility. Ramon Cano, 28, allegedly conspired with prisoner Gerardo Alvarez-Montanez to bring heroin, methamphetamine, money and cell phones into the prison. A grand jury indictment charged the two men with conspiring to provide and possess contraband, distribution of a controlled substance and bribery of a public official. Montanez pleaded guilty to conspiracy on June 23, 2014 and was sentenced in September to five years in prison; Cano pleaded guilty in August 2014 and is scheduled to be sentenced on December 15, 2014.

Connecticut: Steven Wolff, a former utility system repair foreman at the Federal Correctional Institution in Danbury, was sentenced on March 12, 2014 to five months in prison for having sex with a prisoner. Wolff and the victim met in the boiler area to engage in sexual relations on several occasions. Another prisoner was given hair dye, candy, over-the-counter medication, greeting cards and other contraband for acting as a lookout for the pair. Wolff had previously pleaded guilty to sexual abuse of a ward on August 6, 2013.

District of Columbia: On April 15, 2014, President Obama granted commutation to a man whose federal prison sentence had been unlawfully extended by a typo in a court document. Ceasar Cantu, who was sentenced to 15 years, filed a motion to correct the error, which was denied by U.S. District Court Judge Jackson Kiser as being untimely. Cantu had been sentenced to 3½ extra years based on a mistake in his presentence report that raised his base offense level. White House officials said Obama's decision to reduce Cantu's sentence was because there was no other legal way to correct the mistake. Cantu is now scheduled for release in May 2015.

Florida: Highlands County Sheriff's Office spokesperson Nell Hays announced on March 2, 2014 that prisoners at the county jail had tested positive for scabies. Hays said jail staff had quickly moved into an "aggressive prevention and control mode" to quell the outbreak. Oral medications were provided to over 400 prisoners and all bedding, towels and uniforms, as well as the jail housing units, were to be treated. Scabies is a highly contagious skin rash caused by the Sarcoptes scabiei mite. Prisoners who had been released around the time of the outbreak were advised to contact their doctors or the county health department.

Florida: On April 1, 2014, former Florida State Fraternal Order of Police general counsel Anthony M. Livoti, Jr., 65, was sentenced to 10 years in prison for his role in a Ponzi scheme that bilked investors out of more than $800 million. Livoti was the only one of 12 defendants who did not accept a plea bargain. A jury found Livoti guilty after a three-month trial; he had originally faced up to 80 years on three fraud and conspiracy counts, and was found not guilty on 20 other related charges. He was also ordered to pay over $826 million in restitution.

Georgia (Europe): Seventeen prisoners at the Geguti Penitentiary in the Eurasian nation of Georgia were hospitalized on February 10, 2014 after protesting mistreatment in the penal system by stabbing themselves. Hundreds of other prisoners participated in a hunger strike during the same protest action. Georgia's Minister of Corrections and Legal Assistance, Sozar Subari, denied the allegations of mistreatment and instead blamed Mafia leaders for initiating the hunger strike.

Georgia (U.S.): An attorney for Douglas County District Attorney David McDade announced on April 2, 2014 that McDade would retire from his position with the county. McDade had been under investigation for inappropriate spending and unauthorized use of county vehicles. A Georgia Bureau of Investigation probe was completed and McDade's attorney, Drew Findling, told news reporters that the case would not be presented to a grand jury. The investigation ended on September 26, 2014 when McDade's former office manager, Tammie Agan, pleaded guilty to 7 misdemeanor counts of theft by taking. She was ordered to pay $7,400 in restitution.

Indiana: Officials at the Marion County Jail said cell blocks at the facility are used for different purposes up to six times a week, resulting in the confusion that led a female prisoner to be locked in a cell block with nine men on March 25, 2014. Although the woman alleged no wrongdoing by the other prisoners, that was not the first time such a mix-up occurred at the facility. Eight months earlier a woman had been locked in a cell with a male prisoner, whom she claimed sexually assaulted her. Marion County Lt. Col. Gary Tingle said the jail had implemented new safeguards to ensure such a mistake would not happen again.

Israel: On April 10, 2014, an Israeli court imposed a fine equivalent to $1,449 and loss of visitation privileges on a Palestinian prisoner, Abdul Karim Rimawi, who had smuggled his sperm to his wife, resulting in the birth of a baby boy. Although other Palestinian prisoners have successfully provided their wives with sperm to conceive children, according to a statement issued by the Palestinian Prisoner Club Association, "The punishment of Rimawi is the first such kind of punishment in the history of [the Israeli] courts."

Kentucky: Jail intake employee Joshua Ayers had been reprimanded at least eleven times for various policy violations at the Louisville Metro Department of Corrections, but remained employed until he was placed on administrative leave without pay following his arrest on March 24, 2014 for allegedly stealing $100 from a prisoner being booked into the facility. Surveillance video from the booking area showed Ayers leaving the room with the prisoner's property; suspicious co-workers notified the police department's Public Integrity Unit, which opened an internal investigation.

Michigan: Jonathan Kermeen, a former Ottawa County jailer, pleaded guilty in February 2014 to two counts of second-degree criminal sexual conduct, and was sentenced on March 10, 2014 to five to fifteen years in prison. Kermeen admitted to having sexual contact with a female prisoner on two occasions, as well as to a third incident involving another prisoner. His plea deal included an agreement that prosecutors would not pursue additional charges. PLN previously reported Kermeen's suspension and subsequent arrest. [See: PLN, June 2014, p.56].

Mississippi: On March 31, 2014, a riot at the Hinds County Detention Center left one prisoner dead, seven others injured and the unit where the fight occurred in ruins. Markuieze Sherod Bennett, 21, died from stab wounds, but no employees were injured according to authorities. The county's Board of Supervisors declared an emergency at the jail and said the county is looking into the possibility of building a new facility. A spokesman for the Board said the age and condition of the jail was to blame for the fight, and that the normal bidding process would be set aside to allow the quick purchase of new radios and cameras for the detention center.

Missouri: A former guard at the U.S. Medical Center for Federal Prisoners in Springfield was sentenced to six years in prison on March 31, 2014 for hiring a hit man to kill his wife's ex-husband. Robert W. Jones contacted a prisoner at the facility while he was employed there, and asked for help in the murder-for-hire scheme. Jones is a veteran, and two doctors testified at sentencing how post traumatic stress disorder played a role in his actions. Sentencing guidelines recommended eight to ten years for the charge of using a telephone with the intent that a murder be committed for payment. Jones had been arrested after providing $1,500 to an undercover FBI agent to commit the murder.

Montana: On February 23, 2014, prisoners reported a bad smell in the west block of the Ravalli County jail. Several days later, jail officials announced that the odor had come from a propane exhaust in the boiler. A number of prisoners reported headaches, nausea and burning eyes, and three people were treated and released at a local hospital; prisoners were evacuated to the jail's library while the boiler area was ventilated. Carbon monoxide levels were checked before the prisoners returned to the cell block.

New Mexico: Torrey Chambers was indicted on eight counts of rape on March 25, 2014 for using his position as a Bernalillo County jailer to not only repeatedly rape prisoners, but to assist a friend in committing rapes as well. At the time of Chambers' indictment, the county had already settled a lawsuit filed by three of the prisoners for $925,000. Due to a clause in a union contract, Chambers was placed on paid rather than unpaid leave while an internal investigation was conducted.

New York: Kimberly Ricci, a former teacher at the Washington Correctional Facility in Comstock, was arrested on February 7, 2014. State officials determined that Ricci, 24, had been bringing heroin and needles into the prison, using the drugs and having sex with a prisoner. She was arraigned and released on her own recognizance, then pleaded guilty to a felony drug count on October 1, 2014. She faces up to 7 years in prison; the prisoner was not charged.

New York: Elizabeth Camue Martinez, 33, and her prisoner-husband, Andres Martinez, 28, were indicted on February

6, 2014 in connection with the overdose deaths of two prisoners at the Attica Correctional Facility. The bodies of Saleem Ali and Glendon Jackson were discovered in their cells on December 5, 2013; both had died from a lethal dose of pure Fentanyl, an opiate about 100 times stronger than morphine. The September 2013 death of another Attica prisoner, Avery Cureton, was also connected to the drugs. Mrs. Martinez was charged with smuggling heroin and marijuana into the prison and giving it to her husband. She pleaded guilty to intent to distribute and conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute on September 24, 2014.

Nigeria: Marilyn Ogar, spokeswoman for Nigeria's State Security Service, announced on March 31, 2014 that 21 people had died in a shootout during an attempted prison escape in Abuja, the nation's capital. Ogar declined to identify whether the dead were prisoners or security personnel; however, a prison security source confirmed that at least one guard had been killed. Jail breaks are common in Nigeria. On March 14, 2014, members of Boko Haram, an Islamic militant group, freed dozens of prisoners from Nigeria's main military barracks.

North Carolina: On April 10, 2014, Frank Arthur Janssen, the father of a Raleigh-area prosecutor, was reunited with his family after a five-day kidnapping ordeal. Five people were arrested for their participation in the plot, which was intended to benefit Kelvin Melton, a prisoner serving a life sentence, whom Janssen's daughter had prosecuted. An FBI hostage rescue team located and recovered Mr. Janssen; he was unharmed. Neighbors said Janssen is a high-security government contractor, and it was initially believed the kidnapping was related to his job.

Oklahoma: Frank Kirk, a 70-year-old attorney, tricked a female prisoner into believing that he represented her and convinced her to expose herself and masturbate in exchange for "legal fees." Kirk was arrested on five misdemeanor counts of lewdness on March 3, 2014 after six visits with the prisoner, during which he smuggled in a sex toy, lubricant, baby wipes and a cell phone in his laptop bag. The woman agreed to cooperate with investigators after she realized Kirk was not her lawyer. Kirk was further charged on March 31 with a felony count of attempting to prevent a witness from testifying, after trying to make the prisoner withdraw her statement. In October 2014, Kirk received a suspended sentence of one year and a $50 fine; he was also ordered to surrender his law license.

company's Cimarron Correctional Facility was charged on March 25, 2014 with sexual battery and providing contraband to a prisoner. Linda Bogaski, 49, allegedly touched the prisoner's genitals and brought him tobacco and a cell phone. Bogaski was informed of the charges and ordered to voluntarily appear in court before an arrest warrant was issued. She made her appearance and subsequently pleaded guilty on June 20, 2014. As part of a plea deal, Bogaski was placed on one year's probation, fined $500 and ordered to undergo a mental health evaluation and perform 100 hours of community service.

Rhode Island: On March 18, 2014, DOC Director A.T. Wall placed four employees on administrative leave after a local television station reported the results of an internal investigation into a séance held in the office of Assistant Corrections Director David McCauley. McCauley allegedly summoned prison guard Heather Anderson – who calls herself “The Mystical Medium” and claims to talk to the dead – to perform psychic readings in his office. McCauley was suspended along with Robert Vitale, warden of the DOC's central office, Gerald Masso, a security specialist, and DOC K9 officer Anthony Lucca.

South Carolina: A mentally ill pretrial detainee at the Alvin S. Glenn Detention Center was assaulted by former guard Robin Smith on February 11, 2012. [See: PLN, Oct. 2013, p.56]. After entering a guilty plea to a civil rights violation, Smith was sentenced to 24 months in federal prison and three years of supervised release in April 2014. “What Robin Smith did was wrong,” said U.S. Attorney Bill Nettles. “At the base level, Mr. Smith kicked a man around who was so mentally ill he could not understand or follow the directions Smith was giving him. No just society can allow that kind of conduct on the part of a corrections officer to go unpunished.”

South Carolina: On March 18, 2014, DOC officials announced that several prisoners had been identified as the “stars” of a viral rap video that appeared to have been filmed and posted online from a prison cell at the Kershaw Correctional Institution. The video is believed to have been recorded with a contraband cell phone, and DOC officials said they had increased security and adopted new counter-measures to combat the flow of phones into the facility. The prisoners were transferred to other institutions.

Tennessee: A Lake County grand jury returned indictments against five people accused of smuggling drugs into the Northwest Correctional Complex. Remeka Carraway, Latonya Johnson, Meri Kristin Doyle, Chelsey Pitts and prisoner Monterious Bell each face one count of introduction of contraband into a penal facility and conspiracy to introduce contraband into a penal facility. Doyle, Pitts, Carraway and Johnson were also charged with possession of a schedule VI drug with intent to deliver. Doyle and Pitts were formerly employed as guards at the prison, but had resigned several months prior to their March 12, 2014 arrests.

Texas: Following an internal affairs investigation, Harris County Sheriff's deputies arrested Dominique Duncan, 23, outside the county's jail complex on February 10, 2014 and charged him with possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver. Duncan, who had been employed as a civilian jail guard since May 2013, was in possession of painkillers only available with a prescription. He was booked into the jail and later released on $10,000 bond.

Texas: The Dallas County Sheriff's Department launched an investigation into a December 12, 2013 incident in which Robert Merrill, 30, was able to bring a loaded gun into the booking area of the Lew Sterrett Justice Center. “If a weapon makes it into a secure location, it's a perfect example of incompetence and is shocking," said Merrill's attorney, Phillip Hayes. Surveillance video showed Merrill putting an item into the trash, where a loaded 9mm handgun was later found by another prisoner on garbage detail. Merrill now faces additional charges of unlawful possession of a firearm by a felon. On March 17, 2014, Dallas County sheriff's deputy Reginald Harris was demoted after an internal investigation found he violated policy by failing to ensure that Merrill was searched.

Texas: On March 5, 2014, TDCJ Office of Inspector General investigators arrested former Eastham Unit prison guard Kevin Vallery for suspicion of bribery and possession of contraband in a penal institution. Vallery, who was discovered with two bundles of tobacco in his pants, admitted to accepting $600 from a prisoner to smuggle the tobacco into the facility. A search of Vallery's vehicle in the parking lot led to the discovery of $600 cash in the center console. He was taken to the Houston County Jail and subsequently released on $25,000 bond.

Wisconsin: On March 31, 2014, a prisoner performing grounds maintenance at the Rock County jail discovered Jimson weed (Datura stramonium) growing on the property, picked it and brought it into the jail. The hallucinogenic plant was then ingested by six prisoners. When they began acting strangely, medical staff was called in and the prisoners were taken to Mercy Hospital and Trauma Center. Jimson weed is not illegal, but jail officials were considering what charges, if any, could be filed against the prisoners for bringing it into the facility. ■
